

ANALYTICAL.

There can be little doubt that congress will formulate a feasible plan for the repression of anarchists and embody it in an efficient law. This is the prerogative of congress. Yet it is not amiss for citizens to make suggestions. In fact, it is commendable and helpful, and will be appreciated by members of congress because it will enable them to know the trend of public sentiment in their respective districts. Many suggestions have been made, some of which are quite absurd and impracticable. We have seen but one, or essentially but one, elaborated scheme for congressional action. It has appeared in a number of states and localities with so little variation as to be practically identical. It proceeds on the view that congress will declare anarchists public enemies, and their acts those of war. It then suggests the creation of a special court composed of officers of the U. S. army and navy which shall exist a specified number of years, as ten, shall hold its sittings in the judicial district in which the crime has been committed. It shall first proceed upon information as a grand jury now does, and if the facts laid before it are such as would cause a grand jury to return an indictment, then, and not before, it shall issue its warrant of arrest and cause such person to be brought before it for trial, and the proceedings of such trial shall be according to the rules and practice which govern courts martial.

The personnel of such a court would be of the highest character, for it would be composed of educated men, familiar with the laws of evidence, trained in searching out facts and setting them in their proper relation. It would be above all partisan influence, beyond the reach of bribery, and would conduct its inquiries in the most impersonal manner. A mere military court of inquiry, rarely, a court martial, never, glosses things. It digs patiently for facts and heeds little else. Unlike courts martial, this proposed court would first inquire as to probable cause for arrest and trial, so that no one would be arrested under mere suspicion, nor as the result of spite or ill-will. Military men are trained to be aware of prosecutions instituted through these motives. A court on which Dewey, Miles, Otis, Howard, Anderson, Chaffee and such men might sit, could be confidently trusted to render justice to the most obscure defendant. The economy of such a court is a commendable feature. Since all its members are already in liberal pay of the government, there would be no extraordinary expenses incurred to pay salaries, while the incidental expenditures would be immaterial when compared with those of the ordinary courts.

Regarding the court to sit in the judicial district where the crime may have been committed is the constitutional provision, and prevents carrying accused persons long distances from the scene of their crime, possibly far from friends, to receive trial.

Proceeding according to the rules which govern courts martial shuts out the confusing, dilatory technicalities, which usually mark and mar the proceedings of the civil courts and not infrequently defeat the ends of justice. Trials before the court are open and public. The same laws of evidence are observed in admitting and weighing testimony here as in other courts, and facts are determined by practically the same methods. Such courts administer justice—cold, calculating, incisive, merciless justice.

The proposed constabulary, or officers of the court, are to be selected from the enlisted men of the army, and veterans of the Civil and the Spanish wars. Their duties would be similar in all respects to these devolving upon U. S. marshals and their deputies. Since, as a rule, they would be peculiarly well qualified for such duties, and would practically be non-partisans there can be no reasonable objection interposed to the suggestion.

As to the creation of a penal colony, we do not see any immediate necessity for it. If we had several hundred anarchists apprehended and convicted, a separate penal colony for each sex might be very useful in ex-terminating the whole brood. It would give an instructive lesson in anarchistic sociology without doubt, but it is not yet necessary that the government should start such an experimental station in sociology. There can be little doubt that the enactment of such a law and the creation of such a court for the avowed purpose of repressing anarchy would have a wholesome deterring influence upon all such destructives. It would present such a combination of moral and physical force as they would fear and the very contemplation of which would awe them into discreet silence. It would be an ever-present, swift acting, mercifully crushing, preponderant force—the one thing they fear. It is doubtful if any would ever defy such laws and fall into the hands of such ministers of justice.

Selections from Roman History

A Literal Translation from Entropius by C. MacLean, Ph. D. Pyrrhus Returns Captives—Disgraced.

(Continued) Afterward Pyrrhus, having associated himself with the Samnites, the Lucanians and the Brutii, hastened to Rome and laid everything waste with fire and sword. He plundered Campania and came to the vicinity of Praeneste—eighteen miles from the city. Then, from fear of the army, which, with a consul, pursued him, he retreated to Campania. The messengers sent to Pyrrhus, touching the ransom of the prisoners were, by him, received with honor. He sent the prisoners of war to Rome without a price. He so admired Fabricius, one of the Roman ambassadors, that, as soon as he had learned that he was poor, he wished by the promise of a fourth of his Kingdom to tempt (him) to go over (as a deserter) to himself; but he was scorned by Fabricius. Wherefore, since he was seized with great admiration for the Romans, Pyrrhus sent an eminent man, Cineas by name, as ambassador to ask for peace on such easy terms that Pyrrhus could keep the part of Italy which he had already seized by force of arms.

Their condition of peace was not satisfactory to Pyrrhus. Word was sent back from the senate that he could have no peace with the Romans unless he withdrew from Italy. Then the Romans ordered that all the captives, whom Pyrrhus had returned, be regarded as disreputable, because, they, being armed men, could be captured; and that they be not restored to their former rank [as citizens], until they had carried back the spoils of the enemy who were slain two each [i. e., two apiece]. So the messengers of Pyrrhus returned. When Pyrrhus inquired of him what sort [of a city] he had found Rome, Cineas said that he saw the native land of kings; that is, almost all in the place were such as Pyrrhus alone was thought to be in Epirus and the rest of Greece.
