

INADEQUATE REMEDIES.

Some men think that if our immigration laws were made more exclusive we shall find the problems of dealing with anarchy and anarchists of easy solution. Senator Chauncey Depew is the most prominent man who holds this view. Mr. Depew is not noted for close analytical thought and accurate knowledge on any subject, so that little weight attaches to his utterances on this matter. It is unfortunate, however, that even a few such men have a vote in determining how we shall deal with anarchy. Something must be done, and something adequate will be done and freedom of speech and liberty of the press will not be impaired nor denied to any man.

Certainly any person who will examine the conditions which exist, and the very grave perils which, springing from these conditions menace our national life, must see that even an utter prohibition of all immigration would not even simplify nor render easier of solution the problem before us. Already there are thousands of anarchists and sympathizers with anarchists in the country. We see them multiplying far more rapidly than is possible from immigration alone. We create them here in this country. Comparatively few reach us through Castle Garden. We would be compelled to forbid all immigration to exclude even so small a number. We will not do this. On general principles our immigration laws should be made more stringent, and probably shall be.

Had Senator Depew spoken to our naturalization laws he had been more practical. Foreigners, tintured it may be with anarchy, are generally clothed with the rights of citizenship. Our attachment to free speech and our habitual abuse of the right presents the opportunity for such to glide off into the dissemination of the vagaries and dangerous theories of anarchism. They claim all the rights and immunities of citizens and we are compelled to accord them. Citizenship has cost them nothing. They do not understand its duties nor comprehend the value of its privileges, and ignorantly mistake our broad, unrestrained liberty for license. Coming here believing that all governments are alike, organized forms of oppression, they hasten to assail our government and abuse our dearly purchased liberties.

We have made legal citizens of them and must endure them. Were they alien denizens we might easily hustle them out of the country. Were they required to be in the country twenty years before becoming citizens, they might then better understand the duties and the privileges of American citizenship.

The whole process of naturalization should be readjusted. The sort of immigration now coming hither makes it necessary that we reform our naturalization laws and the administration of them. For the most obvious reasons the administration of these laws should be placed wholly in the hands of the U. S. District courts.

But revising our immigration and our naturalization laws and rendering them more restrictive does not aid in the solution of the problem before us. At most it would but aid in preventing the recurrence of similar problems.

The congressman or senator who attempts to deceive the people by any such little, inadequate remedies will be called to account. Yet here is danger. Some of our legislators are both physical and moral cowards; others are in sympathy with some of the mischief-making elements of our social, industrial and political life. These will advocate compromise, that misleading, deceitful siren that ever promises fair yet ever lures to greater perils. Compromise never settled anything. It has written the bloodiest, the most humiliating chapters in American history. The people demand justice for anarchists not cowardly compromise with them.

Mr. G. A. Stillman, a merchant of Tampico, Ill., writes: "Foley's Kidney Cure is meeting with wonderful success. It has cured some cases here that physicians pronounced incurable. I myself am able to testify to its merits. My face today is a living picture of health, and Foley's Kidney Cure has made it such." Sold by Graham & Wortham.

Selections from Roman History

In the consulships of Marcus Minucius Rufus and Publius Cornelius war was made on the Istrians, because they had committed piracy on Roman vessels that were supplying corn; and all were subdued. In the same year the Second Punic War was thrust upon the Romans by Hannibal, the Carthaginian general, who, having, in the twentieth year of his age, gathered together one hundred and fifty thousand [soldiers], undertook to storm Saguntum, a city of Spain, [which was] friendly to the Romans. The Romans ordered him, through their envoys, to refrain from war. [But] he was not willing to give a hearing to the messengers. The Romans now sent to Carthage to warn Hannibal not to wage war against the allies of the Roman people. By the Carthaginians' offensive [lit. harsh] replies were made [lit. given]. Meanwhile, the people of Saguntum are overgrown with hunger, and those captured by Hannibal are treated with extreme cruelty. War is declared against the Carthaginians.

Tien Publius Cornelius Scipio proceeded with an army to Spain, and Tiberius Sempronius to Sicily. Hannibal having left Hasdrubal, his brother, in Spain, crossed the Pyrenees. He opened for himself [across] the Alps, a way on that side heretofore [thought] impassable. It is said that he led to Italy eighty thousand foot-soldiers, ten thousand cavalry, and thirty-seven elephants. Meanwhile, many Ligurians and Gauls joined themselves to Hannibal. Sempronius Gracchus, having learned of the coming of Hannibal toward Italy, brought his army from Sicily to Ariminum.

HANNIBAL'S VICTORIES—BATTLE OF CANNÆ. Publius Cornelius Scipio was the first to encounter Hannibal. When he joined battle, and he and his forces were put to flight, he returned to camp. At the river Fræbia Sempronius Gracchus also fights. He, too, is conquered. In Italy many surrendered to Hannibal. Coming toward Etruria, Hannibal next encountered Flaminius, the consul. Flaminius he slew on the spot, and twenty-five thousand of the Romans were cut down. The rest fled in different directions. Afterward, Quintus Fabius Maximus was sent by the Romans against Hannibal. By postponing the fight he prevented him from attacking in force. Then as soon as the opportunity came [to him] he conquered.

In the five hundredth and fortieth year after the building of the city, Lucius Aemilius Paulus and Publius Tarentius Varo are sent against Hannibal and they succeed Fabius, who, going away, warned both consuls that they could conquer Hannibal, a skillful but impetuous general, not otherwise than by postponing the battle. But when by the impatience of Varo, the consul, the other consul being opposed to it, a battle was fought in Apulia, near a village which is called Cannæ, both consuls were conquered by Hannibal. In this battle three thousand of the Africans perished, and a great part of the army of Hannibal was mortally wounded. Yet in no Punic battle were the Romans more roughly handled. For in it the consul, Aemilius Paulus, perished, twenty consuls or proconsuls, thirty senators, three hundred renowned heroes were captured or cut down, [and] of soldiers forty thousand, [and] of knights three thousand and five hundred. Yet, amid all these misfortunes not one of the Romans deigned to mention peace. Slaves were manumitted and made soldiers, a thing which never before had been done.

After this battle many cities of Italy, which had been subject to the Romans, transferred themselves to Hannibal. Hannibal offered to the Romans that they could ransom the captives; but by the senate's answer was made: "Those citizens are not necessary [to the welfare of the state], who, when they were armed men, could be taken captive." He afterward put [them] all to death by means of different kinds of torture, and sent to Carthage three modic [some say bushels, others pecks] of golden rings which he had taken from the hands of Roman knights, senators and soldiers.

The most attractive thing that has been in the Valley for some time is a patent gate which has recently been built by L. G. Price. It is attractive, not only because it is made by home talent but because of its simplicity and the ease with which it works. And also the ease with which it may be applied to different conditions and positions. It is said by those who have seen it to be a wonderful invention and many are wondering why they could not have found such a method. X.
