

UNRIGHT AND RIGHT.

It is most unfortunate that men attempt to reach right and delectable objects by methods which are utterly repellent. We often see this in politics and in industrial and social life, but nowhere so frequently as in the field of moral and religious propaganda.

Politicians usually are wise and discreet in choice of their methods—adjusting them so carefully to the conditions they must face and the purposes they would accomplish that they gain their ends often before their opposers are aware of it. It may be, indeed often is true that opposition has aided in bringing about the result. It not infrequently occurs that the thing accomplished is so manifestly just, right and desirable that opposition ceases and the accomplished fact is accepted by every one.

In the work of moral reform and of religious propaganda we have a right to expect the selection of the wisest and most efficient method, for the leaders in such matters are expected to "be wise as serpents, harmless as doves." Such expectation is usually forced into humiliating disappointment.

It should go without saying that there is no considerable community in which there is not a clean, well defined, courageous, purposeful and high moral sentiment. Neither is there any such community where any are devoid of religious teaching and church privileges. The religious life of such communities embraces the majority—touches every one. Such communities have all the organized forces of advancement, and by a process of evolution, of steady, healthful growth and development are bound to reach higher and yet higher planes of thought and purpose. This is the natural, sensible and efficient method, especially in communities where there is no "submerged tenth." The people of such communities usually understand their condition, their necessities, their possibilities. They feel equal to any right and needed action.

It may be, usually is that in the community there are a few who forget that "Rome was not built in a day." They see a certain end which must be reached at once. They are too impatient, too emotional it may be to reason as to methods. They are strangers to close, analytical thought on any subject, hence adopt crude, imperfect, mischievous methods.

It not unfrequently transpires that these impracticables come into a community where they are entire strangers. They know nothing of the thought, life, purposes and condition of the people; yet before they can find their way around the nearest block they are declaiming against the laws, the morals and the religious life of the people. Public officers are maligned, good, reputable, honest citizens are abused, and the mass of the people spoken of as being without any high moral perceptions or righteous purposes. It matters not whether this is done by home or by imported "talent" or by a dazzling combination of the two, the result is the same. Many good people are grieved, some angered, all disgusted, and harm rather than good is done.

Moral advancement is not made as a line of attacking soldiers carry an enemy's entrenchments—by a series of "rushes," but by slow, careful, guarded, persistent approaches.

Most communities rely upon their own well chosen, carefully fitted agencies for moral development. Their work endures for it is symmetrically builded on solid foundations. It is directed upon individuals rather than upon masses. It thus builds up a steady, sturdy, efficient public sentiment on all moral questions. Spasmodic efforts never do this. These at best are but wasted energy. Emotional morality never outgrows its swaddling clothes. Appeals to the reason, the judgment, the intelligence and self-respect of men will carry them some distance to-day and yet further to-morrow. There is no backward lapse, there is no room, no occasion for any. Men, as individuals, learn that "Italy lies beyond" and they hopefully, gladly toil on. It is thus, and only thus that communities are raised to higher levels and moral good clothed with immortality.

Selections from Roman History

A Literal Translation from Eutropius by C. MacLennan, Ph. D.—The Third Punic War.

Then, in the six hundred and second year after the building of the city, in the consulship of Lucius Manlius Censorius and Marcus Manlius, [and] in the first year after the second Punic war, the third Punic war was [in it] undertaken. These [the consuls just named] set out for Carthage, [and] took [it] by storm. Against them fought Hasdrubal, the general of the Carthaginians. Famae, another general, was at the head of the Carthaginian cavalry. At that time, Scipio, grandson of Scipio Africanus, was waging war there as a tribune. For this man there was among all classes remarkable fear and respect. For he was looked upon as most thoroughly equipped for fighting, and eminently proficient [in the art of war]. Therefore, through his instrumentality many wars were waged successfully by the consuls. Nor did [either] Hasdrubal or Famae shrink from anything more than to begin battle against that part of the Roman [line] where Scipio was fighting.

Within the same period Masinissa, king of the Numedians, having died in the 97th year of his life, leaving 41 children, authorized Scipio to be the divider of his kingdom among his sons. Since, therefore, the name of Scipio was famous, he, although as yet a youth, was made consul, and sent against Carthage. This [city] he captured and reduced to ruins. The spoils-of-war found there, which Carthage had collected from the ruins of various cities, and the ornaments, which they recognized as their own, he returned to the inhabitants of the cities of Sicily, Italy [and] Africa. Thus Carthage was destroyed in the seven hundredth year after it had been founded. Scipio deserved the name which his grandfather had received, that is, that on account of his valor he should be called Africanus the younger.
