

TODAY'S CONVENTION.

The republican convention which meets today has not aroused the interest usually manifested in this important event.

Already the opposing party is endeavoring to nominate the republican ticket, but republicans are competent to select their own candidates, and have learned "to beware of the Greeks when they come bearing gifts."

ALWAYS CONSISTENT.

One of the seeming anomalies of politics is the exchange of position on public questions which places a party where its antagonist formerly stood.

Just now this change is made apparent by the contention over the financial measure prepared by congressman Fowler, chairman of the house committee on Banking and Currency, and agreed to by the committee.

Here is, in fact, a contention between those who hold that banking is not a proper function of the government, and those who wish to see it continue as it now does, allied with those who hold that all currency should be issued directly by the government and banks of issue be abolished.

It is within the memory of not very old men when the two great parties stood on almost exactly opposite sides of this question from where they now stand.

This change of position on great questions is usually ascribed by the careless observer to party insincerity, and accepted as evidence of political inconsistency. This is rarely if ever the case. It more frequently occurs because there has arisen altogether a new set of conditions.

It is true that principles do not change; but whether this or that set of principles shall be adopted and followed depends very much, if not wholly, upon present conditions and the possibilities and necessities these conditions present.

The party which should advocate the application of the same principles under all circumstances to a question of public policy would soon be left behind by the onward march of progress, and become merely a party of obstruction and negation, consistent only in its honest inability to understand the requirements of changed conditions and in its certain opposition to all measures which intelligently recognize such change.

It is the just boast and the glory of the republican party that it is wedded to no hoary precedents which prevent it from advocating such measures and policies as the present condition of the country requires. It is this which has made its policies fruitful of good to the whole country, and its measures vehicles bearing the American people upward and onward in an individual and national development which amazes the world.

Not always wholly free from mistakes, but gathering strength and wisdom even from these, purified when necessary and kept true to its patriotic purposes by the active, independent and intelligent spirit of its rank and file, the party stands today for all the best interests of a mighty people who confidently look to it for a right and wise solution of every problem which confronts them.

HOMER'S ILLIAD.

Book II—A Literal Translation by C. MacLennan, Ph. D.

Vv. 338-393.—The speech of Nestor and Agamemnon's reply:

(Agamemnon's reply concluded)

Then King Agamemnon, replying, said to him:

"Yes, truly again, as often before, thou, old man, surpassest the sons of the Achaeans in counsel. Would, O father Zeus and Athena and Apollo, that I had of the Achaeans ten such fellow-counselors. Then quickly would the city of King Priam bow her head, captured and destroyed by our hands."

Let each one fit well his spear, let each one fit well his shield, let each one feed well his swift-footed steeds, and let each one, having looked carefully round about his chariot, prepare for the battle, that we may measure our strength in dread battle all day long.

Let each one fit well his spear, let each one fit well his shield, let each one feed well his swift-footed steeds, and let each one, having looked carefully round about his chariot, prepare for the battle, that we may measure our strength in dread battle all day long.

Government Whitewash.

ED. GAZETTE: The Corvallis Improvement Association would like to have this recipe published in your paper, if you will be so kind as to give it room.

Respectfully, MISS N. CAMPBELL.

About twice a week through the year we are asked for the recipe for the whitewash used on the government buildings.

We have answered this inquiry a score of times through the question and answer department, and ten score times at least by mail to individuals.
