

NOT A MOSES.

The governor of Pennsylvania, who was inaugurated the 21st ult., delivered an unusually able inaugural address, replete with careful thought on questions not wholly confined to the limits of his state.

The chances were that the plan would have gone aglimmering had it not been for the free and enthusiastic "booming" given by the newspapers from patriotic motives.

The Lewis and Clark Fair would be a small affair, indeed, and the results nil were it not for the support given by the newspapers.

It is asserted that wage workers were forced to form trade unions because employers of labor had already formed combinations inimicable to the laborer.

It is not surprising that publications in the interest of labor should make this assertion, but it is inexplicable that independent and reputable publishers should accept it as true.

It is wholly false and misleading. The labor-union is an exotic, imported from England and domiciled here years before there was any sort of associative organization by employers.

In the glass, iron and steel trades the first association of the manufacturers was for the sole purpose of regulating competition among themselves.

It would be quite difficult for labor to show, conclusively, the existence of any association of employers for the purpose of limiting the number of men employed and fixing the wages they should receive.

The evidence of this, if there were no other, is found in the fact that labor unions are even now striving for a uniform wage scale, regardless of the diverse conditions under which the labor should be performed.

Again, he says: "The state is interested, within reasonable bounds, in bringing about a state of things in which labor shall have higher wages and capital less profit than now."

It would have been an invaluable contribution to political economy had he clearly shown us just what are the "reasonable bounds" of the state's interest in this connection, and also what sort of legislation within such bounds will raise the wages of labor and cut down the profit of capital.

Nowhere in human endeavor and experience have we yet found, nowhere in the bounds of human wisdom we hope to find, legislation which will satisfy labor with its wages and capital with its profits.

A right and virtuous public sentiment is the only force which will carry us to a correct and abiding solution of this and kindred questions.

Governor Pennypacker is not destined to be a Moses to lead us to any different and practicable methods of solution.

NEWSPAPERS BEAR BRUNT.

C. H. McIsaac, commissioner from this state to several states in the interest of the Lewis and Clark Fair, dropped a significant remark upon his return home, Friday night, when he said:

"I saw the newspapers, too, and I must say that all of them are cordial friends of the Lewis and Clark Fair."

Mr. McIsaac stated what is perhaps a platitude, yet it may be well again to call attention to the fact that the newspapers bear the brunt of the burden of public advancement, performing the service practically without compensation.

Presume a work of public character to be undertaken. The first move is to ask the newspapers to advertise the project.

"Please arouse interest in the plan," say the promoters to the newspaper man, who proceeds forthwith to take up the battle for the idea, if it be commendable, and to create support by iteration and reiteration.

Finally, a meeting held of prominent citizens, who, upon the foundation that has been built by the newspaper advocacy, often do not hesitate to take to themselves credit for inception and completion of the plan, and probably after it all ends, complain because the paper did not do more in furtherance of it.
