

CAN THEY SUCCEED?

Certain democratic leaders are very desirous of purging their party of its most mischievous isms and restoring it to its ancient and historical landmarks.

The first thing is to get rid of Bryan and Bryanism. Whatever principles the party may adopt, whether dragged from the scrap pile of things worn out and discarded or constructed in the laboratory of demagoguery and opportunity, nothing can be done until William Jennings and his theories have been made harmless.

Thousands of the rank and file lift up their voices and shout, "great is the orator of the Platte; we will follow him!"

Bryan must lead, or must name the leader of the party in the next presidential campaign. With him means defeat, without him means disruption of the party more hopeless than that of 1860.

We are indifferent as to what democratic leaders may do to reorganize the party. It is quite probable it must continue to use things bearing the Bryanian stamp.

The conclusion of the matter is that while men should adhere to honesty from principle, a political party having no principles should adhere to it from policy.

HOME TRAINING.

Last Sunday's Oregonian has a plain, forceful editorial dealing with "aspects of social life" which should be read and carefully pondered by every parent, indeed by every one having control of children and youth.

There can be no doubt that the exhibition, of depravity which obtrude upon public notice through the press and court proceedings are clearly the result of deficient parental training or the total neglect of it.

Whatever causes this neglect of home training the fact remains we have found no substitute for it. "Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it" was a truth before Solomon formulated it, and it will remain true until the human species becomes extinct.

Primarily and naturally parents must do the training. They must know that whatever agency they employ to aid them, as teacher and schools, associates, books, amusement and employment contributes positively and distinctly to a right training.

There is little doubt that the mass of parents have shuffled their own responsibility and committed the training of their children to agencies which they complacently regard as pre-eminently fitted for the purpose.

But are such agencies doing the work of training on right lines and therefore efficiently? Is it not probable that not a few of such chosen agencies are palpable failures when we study results? It is manifest that there is an insufficiency in our educational process.

The Oregonian asks: "In divorcing church from state, and religion from education, have we not come near to eliminating the moral element in the child's life?" We do not suppose from this that the Oregonian favors a church establishment, but rather that the state should give more attention to religious training.

not the separation of church and state, nor because of this separation that our public educational processes do not more fully recognize the religious element. It is because we have mistaken creed and ecclesiastical dogma for religion.

Men are rapidly coming to a more rational view. They already see the distinction between creed and religion. They see the maximum of religion in the minimum of creed. They believe that our public educational agencies can give to the young sound religious training without any sort of sectarian bias.

No sect will be permitted to control our public schools, but sectarian jealousy and distrust are so rapidly passing away as to encourage the belief that at no distant day the people, regardless of sect, will demand that their children shall be given more distinctly religious training than the schools now impart. Yet were this accomplished it would not relieve parents of the duty of giving their children careful religious training. Moral training is not sufficient. It must be religious. It must embrace the relation of man to his Creator. It must instill the child with his individual accountability to a righteous Supreme Being, an accountability from which there is no escape.
