A feature of the program of sports to be given during carnival week, will be a foot race between W. J. Howell and F. G. Elgin. General J. T. Thorp will begin a thorough canvass of Benton county, in the interest of the republican candidate for congress, at Summit today. General Thorp is one of the ablest orators in Oregon, and supporters of Hon. Binger Hermann will find no apathy among republican voters in this county when the polls are opened on the morning of June 1st.

A half tone of Dennis H. Stovall, accompanied by a very complimentary sketch of his literary career appears in last Saturday's Portland Telegram. Although but 23 years of age, Dennis has already gained an enviable reputation as a descriptive and short-story writer. The GAZETTE takes an especial interest in this young writer, for it was in this office that he had his first experience as a newspaper reporter. He and his wife, now reside in one of the prettiest homes in Grant's Pass, built entirely, as Mr. Stovall avers, from the receipts of his "stuff." Aside from his work on the Telegram, Mr. Stovall is a regular contributor to nearly every mining journal in the West, and has also written stories for Overland and Sunset, of San Francisco; Out West, of Los Angeles; Pacific Monthly, of Portland; Munsey's and Four-Track News, of New York; Pets and Animals, of Cincinnati.

Law Knows No Favorites.

Corvallis experienced another jail break the other night. Two prisoners of mature years pushed some bricks out of the east wall of the city bastille, and in the morning the jailer discovered their absence and a note stating that they had served the customary time for the offense charged against them, and decided to leave.

A few months ago a number of youths of this city were incarcerated for a misdemeanor. They broke jail and the whole town was in a state of uproar. Messages were flashed to every city in the state warning the officers to apprehend the fugitives. When they were captured a special officer was dispatched to escort them back to this city. They were tried and severely dealt with. This was right and proper, for the law is society's only protection and respect for it must be enforced.

In the present instance, however, there seems to be a disposition to treat the whole matter as a joke. One of the offenders has been guilty of a similar offense on two former occasions and has gotten off lightly. Young boys know of these things. They have no understanding of the sacredness or majesty of the law. When they violate an ordinance, they believe that they have merely outwitted the officers. The city authorities are under oath to enforce the laws. If they regard that oath lightly, and permit old offenders to break the law with impunity, they are in a measure responsible for the misdemeanors committed by boys and young men.

MR. REAMES WAS HERE.

Democratic Candidate Failed to Arouse any Enthusiasm During His Visit in Corvallis.

The managers of the present democratic congressional campaign find their greatest hope of success in the apathy which they allege pervades the ranks of republican voters. That democratic voters are also affected with apathy was evident, Saturday afternoon, when an effort was made to enthrone enough of them to supply Mr. Reames with an audience. The cadet band was called shortly after noon and gave a concert that attracted and entertained the crowd until 2 o'clock when the speaking began.

B. F. Irvine introduced Mr. Reames to an audience of about 200 persons of all parties. He called attention to the fact that he had introduced Geo. E. Chamberlain to a similar audience, on a similar occasion about a year ago. Mr. Irvine believed that the success of Mr. Chamberlain would contribute to the success of Mr. Reames. By accepting Mr. Irvine's theory and carrying it out, republicans can see that the election of Mr. Reames will contribute to the success of the democratic candidate who will oppose Theodore Roosevelt for president next year. In other words every time republican voters assist democrats to office they strengthen the organization of that party.

Mr. Reames began his remarks with a fling at Binger Hermann. He said he didn't intend to abuse Mr. Hermann, but was going to have some fun with him. With this he proceeded to ridicule and belittle his opponent whom he took to task for possessing those qualities of sociability and comradship which Governor Chamberlain is said to possess so abundantly.

The speaker said that the most important questions at present are those growing out of the relations between capital and labor, and he devoted five minutes to a consideration of those questions. "Capital," he said, "is organized to control markets and labor. The tariff laws make possible the combinations of capital." But capital finds as little difficulty in forming combinations in free-trade countries as it does in the United States, and the same questions growing out of the relations between capital and labor are troubling all the civilized nations on the globe. President Roosevelt has said in this connection: "No change in tariff duties can have any substantial effect in solving the so-called trust problem." If Mr. Reames is as solicitous for the feelings of President Roosevelt as he would lead republicans to believe, he must not give him the lie in this matter. Nay, more, he must subscribe to the views expressed by President Roosevelt if he is to be in harmony with the present administration.

Democrats made the campaign of 1892 on the argument that the surplus that had accumulated in the United States treasury through the operation of the republican tariff laws should be removed, said Mr. Reames. And right there the voter who remembered how that surplus was dissipated by the democratic administration, and how President Cleveland was compelled to issue bonds to replenish the gold reserve, decided that he didn't want any of Mr. Reames proposed tariff tinkering.

The speaker said that the republican administration after the trusts reminded him of a dog after a train. He said that congress has power to control the trusts, but he failed to point out where a democratic congress ever had passed an anti-trust law, or made an attempt to enforce the Sherman law placed on the statute books by a republican congress.

"I would not strike down the Eastern manufacturer," said Mr. Reames. But the tariff policy he advocates struck down these manufacturers in 1892, and demoralized every industry in the country. In August of 1893, President Cleveland said: "With plenteous crops, with abundant promise of remunerative production and manufacture, with unusual invitation to safe investment; and with satisfactory assurance to business enterprise, suddenly financial distrust and fear have sprung up on every side. Numerous moneyed institutions have suspended because abundant assets were not immediately available to meet the demands of frightened depositors. Surviving corporations and individuals are content to keep in hand the money they are usually anxious to loan, and those engaged in legitimate business are surprised to find that securities they offer for loans, though heretofore satisfactory, are no longer accepted. Values supposed to be fixed are fast becoming conjectural, and losses and failure have involved every branch of business." Oh, no; Mr. Reames wouldn't strike down Eastern manufacturers!

"We are in the Philippines to stay," asserted the speaker with great positiveness, and no one showed a disposition to question the statement. Some of those present were at least four years ahead of Mr. Reames in finding this out. He said that manufacturers are necessary to the development of this coast; that factories would be established here when there is a market for their products; that the countries of the Orient will supply this market. The democratic party evidently did not have an appreciation of the value of the Oriental market, when it made its campaign against the retention of the Philippine islands. Mr. Reames need not worry about the policy of the government in its relations with our new possessions. He and his party will be admitting the wisdom of the solution of these problems by republican administrations, when the country refuses longer to listen to their objections.

DALLAS WAS EASY.

The Farmers Won the Field Meet Saturday Without Effort.

The track and field contest between the Dallas college and O. A. C. athletes on agricultural field last Saturday afternoon was too one-sided to be interesting. The visitors did not take a point until the meet was half over, and scarcely gave the farmers practice. They were a sturdy set of boys, but have no trainer and their best sprinter, Poling, was not in condition. Dallas took but two first places, Teats winning the mile and Lowner the pole vault. The latter cleared the bar at 9 feet, 10 inches at his last trial, but the effort was so great that he collapsed and fell in such a manner that his left arm was thrown out of place at the elbow. Rinehart fell in the 440-yard run, but pluckily continued in the race, finishing third. Jackson's putting of the shot 37 feet and 2 inches in his only trial was the feature of the meet. The final score was O A C, 107 1/2; Dallas, 18 1/2.

Following are the events and the names of those who took places:

ALMOST A RIOT.

A Gang of Portland Toughs Disturb the Quiet of a Corvallis Sabbath Afternoon.

If all those who came to Corvallis, Sunday, on the Grand Sachem's excursion from Portland belong to the Order of Red Men, some one ought to be prosecuted for selling liquor to Indians. Of the 21 coach cars that arrived over the C. & E. at 1:30 o'clock that afternoon, at least a third of them were high, wide and handsome. Young braves, ranging from 18 to 25 years of age, sucked at bottles of "red eye" as they walked the streets, and some of the older bucks were decidedly mellow. There were many in the party who bore the stamp of respectability, but the majority ranged from shabby genteel to ultra-disreputable. The latter element were out looking for trouble and they got their money's worth. While the respectable excursionists were visiting with friends or enjoying a walk through the college grounds, the rowdies and cheap sports were parading Main street looking for an excuse to "get bad." That excuse might have been lacking had not the Salvation Army put in an inopportune appearance. Their arrival on the scene at the First National bank corner was heralded with jeers by the hundred or more roysterers assembled in that neighborhood. Chief Alexander saw the coming storm and he attempted to avert it by sending the salvationists back to their barracks. This they refused to do. Some of the Portland contingent resented this interference on the part of the police, and upon their advice "Banty" Barrett, a professional pugilist, assaulted the officer. A free for all fight ensued, and "Banty" emerged from the melee minus a portion of one ear. He was taken to a neighboring drugstore where his anatomy was sewed together. His companions were worsted in their efforts to take the town, and they were surly because of their failure. Johnson Porter had rendered conspicuous service to Chief Alexander and he was singled out for rough treatment. But Mr. Porter was in no mood to trifle with the flowers of Portland's pugdom, so he drew his revolver and securing an advantageous position intimated that there would be work for the coroner if the matter was carried further. This had the desired effect, and the crowd found the way back to the excursion train.

Effie Allie Headrick.

Friends of the family were shocked Sunday morning when told that Miss Allie Headrick was dead. Her illness had been of such short duration that only her intimate acquaintances knew that she was not well. She suffered an attack of appendicitis Monday of last week and a physician was summoned, but her case was not thought to be serious. Later, however, peritonitis developed and Dr. Bird was called from Salem to assist the local physicians, and an operation was resorted to. But medical skill was of no avail and the final summons came Sunday morning at 9 o'clock.

Effie Allie Headrick was born in Alsea, Oregon, September 23, 1878. She grew to womanhood in this county, but for the last few years made her home in Salem. She was a favorite with all who knew her and many friends sincerely mourn her loss.

The surviving relatives, are: The father, W. J. Headrick, of Alsea; four brothers, S. G., of Corvallis; A. L., of Salem; L. G., of Alsea; Otto, of Salem; two sisters, Mrs. Preston and Mrs. Rycraft, of Moscow, Idaho.

Funeral services will be conducted at the residence of Wm. Bogue this afternoon at 2 o'clock, and interment will be made in Crystal Lake cemetery.
