Holy Week in Masbate, P. I.

The place is the pueblo of Masbate, and the time "holy week," the native population have quit work, "an act that comes natural to them," and are out to enjoy the "fiesta." The first evening we are visited by eleven old men wearing brown habits with cowls, and carrying staffs with crosses on the ends. They represented the eleven disciples, "Judas being dead," and after wishing "Buenas tardes" ask for alms. This is asked of every house in the pueblo, until the ending of the "fiesta."

Following these men comes the evening procession, consisting of almost the entire population. As they advance they sing, and in the procession they carry platforms, upon which are images of the saints. We were unable to distinguish them but took particular notice of Mary Magdalene who held in her right hand a bottle of French perfume. These images were taken from the shrines erected in various parts of the pueblo, to the church and then returned to the shrines. In the evening the women gather before these shrines, and on their knees, sing the story of the crucifixion, in a high key, and weird and sing song style. As our quarters were very near a shrine, I became quite familiar with the entire service, especially so when they kept at it until the small hours of the morning.

One morning we visited the shrines, and at one the people had put the images on the ground, and were busily engaged changing the decorations.

We asked the old "tao" the name of a saint, pointing to the image he replied "San Juan," and "who is this with the key?" we asked? "San Pedro." Then pointing to the image of Christ we said "who is this saint?" He replied "Jesu Cristo." Now we wanted to impress the old fellow with "los Americanos" ignorance of spiritual matters, so we said "who is Christ?" The old man turned slowly and with a look of compassion that showed his pity for us, said in a sad voice, "Senores don't you know?" "Christ was a Spaniard from Galilee."
