LOST HIS TEMPER.
A Domestic Tale For the Hot Headed Man to Digest.
A certain prominent lawyer noted for having a temper when provoked was invited, with his wife, to a doings out in sassify the other night.

Of course he got out his evening clothes, including an expansive bosomed shirt and all the rest of the full dress outfit.
When he was all ready to start, and his wife kept remarking that they were late, he noticed that his patent leathers looked sort of dingy down about the sole, and his wife agreed that his shoes didn't look right. Then he remembered that they had some liquid shoe polish in the house that would be just the thing, and he went after it.

As he was finishing the left shoe he straightened up for a moment and noticed that he had dropped a wee teentys drop of the polish on his snowy white shirt bosom. It was such a small particle, hardly as big as a pin head, that it wouldn't have mattered. Probably no one but himself would have noticed it. But, finding it there just as he was about to start for the society event that he was to be dragged off to, it ruffled him.

"Look at this!" he called to his wife.
"I don't see anything but a little speck on your shirt," responded the faithful and doting wife mildly.
"That's all you see, hey? Well, you'll see more'n that pretty quick. I'm here to tell you! If this dauber and shirt are going to give me trouble, I'll just make the shirt look real good and rotten while we're at it!" Whereupon he took the dauber and drew two broad black lines down over the shirt bosom, then two across, forming a double cross effect; then to that he added a lot of scrolls and crosses at different angles until the shirt front looked like a dissipated printer's towel.

"Now, then!" remarked the lawyer triumphantly.
"I should say it was 'now, then'! Now, then, indeed!" This from his wife. "Now we can't go to the party at all—and after going and getting a new gown for the affair! All on account of that abominable, ungovernable temper of yours!" And she swept from the room.

The lawyer by that time was cooling down. His work on his shirt front had served to relieve his temper just as he intended it to, and he began then to look for another shirt, but every other dress shirt had been sent to the laundry, and all the stores were closed. He happened to think of a friend up the street who would wear about the same size shirt he did, and he rushed to the phone to call him up, but the exchange girl handed him back that tantalizing "They don't answer," and then it occurred to him that of course the friend wasn't at home, for of course he and his wife were by that time on the way to that same party that he should have been on his way to by that time like an upright, decent gentleman.

His wife was right—they would have to stay home, and he knew what it meant to keep his wife home from something for which she had bought a brand new outfit. There was no chance to shift the blame either. His wife had him literally with the goods on, and the goods were still there on his shirt front.

If you think by reading on farther you'll find that he got out of it somehow, you might as well go ahead and finish your breakfast or whatever you're doing. They stayed home.

And, although that was several days ago and he's been taking things home to his wife every evening since and staying in nights and doing the model husband act like one that was brought up to it, he hasn't squared himself yet.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.
