The hunt far the missing man was kept up till after midnight. Guns were fired and men halloed. Several times it was thought by the searchers that they heard an answer to their cries. The following morning Swinger came into camp just as a new party had o ganized to go in search of him. He reported that he became bewildered shortly after leaving his companions, and that he wandered about the mountains—the first night companions, and that he wandered about the mountains—the first night holding the post for the deer which the other hunters said would probably come to him. The second night he heard panthers cry, and he crept under a log to sleep, placing his back against the log and his face fronting the only possible point of approach left to the wild besits. No partners disturbed his slumbers, and fortunately he started out when daylight came, and arrived at home just in time for breakfast, and to save another party a crazy search. Another party however, had started in search from an ever, had started in search from an ever the first night.
