It is estimated that railroad building for the year will be 8000 miles.

The Cure of Cucumber.

Translated freely from the French of Alphonse Audet.

Father Martin was the cure of Cucunghan. There was no better man, and he cherished for his Cucunghan flock a paternal affection—in fine, Cucunghan would have been for him the perfect paradise had only his people been a little more solicitous about their souls. But, alas, the spider spun its web in the unfrequented confessional and the worthy priest's heart was almost broken.

Nightly, however, he prayed to heaven that he might not be tempted from earth until he had brought his strayed sheep back to the fold. You will see that his prayer was heard.

One Sunday, after reading the gospel, Father Martin entered the pulpit and thus addressed his parishioners.

"Dearly beloved brethren, the other night I found myself, miserable sinner though I am, at the gates of heaven. I knocked and Peter opened the gates at once. 'Hailo,' he said, 'is that you my good Father Martin? To what am I indebted? What can I do for you? 'Good Father, you see, I am a poor sinner, and the keys, could you tell me, if it is not an imposition, how many Cucunghans you have up here?'"

"I can refuse you nothing, Father Martin. Sit down and we will run over the list together. So the saint took down his big register and put on his spectacles. 'Let us see Cucunghan, I think you said—Cucunghan—Cucunghan—ah, here we are! My dear sir, the page is blank! Not one single, solitary soul! There are just as many Cucunghans in heaven as there are teeth in a hen!'"

"What, I exclaimed, 'not one! There must be some mistake about it. Perhaps you haven't posted your books up to date. Look again, I beg of you.' 'No mistake about it, worthy man,' replied Peter, 'look for yourself if you think I am joking.'"

"Dearly beloved brethren, you can imagine my distress! Come, come," said Peter, "don't take on so, or you'll be ill. You are not responsible, anyway, and the probability is that your Cucunghans are in quarantine down in purgatory."

"For the love of heaven, then, good St. Peter, allow me to see them—to console them!" "Willingly, my friend, but put on these sandals, for it is bad walking. Keep right down this lane until on the right hand you see a silver door all studded with black crosses. Knock, and you will be admitted. Good-bye! Be good to yourself."

"Dearly beloved brethren, I set out down the lane. And such a lane—the gooselike comes out all over me when I think of it. It was all paved with sharp thorns and putrid odors. But at last I reached the silver door, and knocked. 'Who's there?' asked a grave voice. 'The cure of Cucunghan.' 'Come in!' I went in, and there I saw a tall and splendid angel, with wings black as night and a sword of light in his hand. He held a diamond key hung at his waist, writing in a book ever so much bigger than St. Peter's. 'Fair angel of God, I said, 'if I am not too presumptuous, have you any Cucunghans here? Any one from Cucunghan?'"

"I am the parish priest," said the angel, "I suppose?" "The same, at your service."

"Dearly beloved brethren, the angel wetted his finger and ran over the pages of his big book and at last he said to me with a deep sigh, 'Father Martin, there are no Cucunghans in purgatory. No resident of Cucunghan in purgatory. I cried; 'then for the love of heaven, where are they all?' 'Up in paradise, my good man! Where else would you have them? But I have just come from paradise and they are not there. At least St. Peter says so, and I don't think he would lie to me. No! he can't have lied, for the cock did not crow. Mother of Heaven, where is my congregation, then?'"

"Well, sir, if your friends are not in Heaven, nor yet here, there is only one place where they can be."

"Dearly beloved brethren, I burst out into such lamentations that the angel was moved. 'My dear sir,' he said, 'if you wish to be sure about it and see for yourself, go down this road until you come to a door on the left, and inquire there. Bless you! and he shut the door behind me. It was a long, steep path all paved with red-hot iron, and I staggered as if I was drunk, the sweat poured from me, my hair stood up on end and my tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. But, thanks to the sandals Peter had given me, I neither stumbled nor fell, and at last I came to a large portal wide open, and glowing red like the mouth of a furnace."

"Dearly beloved brethren, they don't ask your name there! They keep no books there! You haven't to knock at the door there! It is always wide open, like the furnace door, and people go in throughs, just as you go into the tavern on the holy Sabbath day. There was a horrible mass of burning flesh, like that which arises when Eloy, the blacksmith, burns out a donkey's hoof before fitting on a shoe, only infinitely worse, and a terrible roar of sighs, sobbings, yellings, oaths! 'Here, you; are you coming in? howled a big-horned demon, making a grab at me with a long, red-hot iron hook. 'No, thank you, sir; I could not think of intruding—in fact, I belong up above!'"

"You see, then, what you are doing down here? I have traveled a long way, good Mr. Devil, to see if by any chance possibly you might have happened to have any one here from Cucunghan. 'Any one from Cucunghan?' yelled the fiend, 'why, you black-froked old fool, all Cucunghan is here! Step this way, and I'll show how we serve your precious Cucunghans down here!'"

"Dearly beloved brethren, I looked, and there, in the midst of a great sheet of flame, I saw—whom did I see? I saw Coq Galene, that great, hulking loafer that used to go around with a camera for the observer's eye, has entirely failed.
