The First Permanent Settlement of Uoquille Valley.

Coquille City Herald. Twenty-five years ago Dr. Henry Hermann landed on the Coquille river with the first arrivals of the Baltimore colony. Being at once enraptured with the dense and unbroken forests of splendid timber stretching from the headwaters to the sea; with the placid and mirror-like tide water ebbing and flowing for fifty miles; and then with the fertile soil and pasture country, the latter extending from upper tide water in luxuriant grassy prairies almost to Port Orford, he concluded to make per- father's claim) we pursued our sad manent settlement and to end the rest of his days in this beautiful valley. He returned to Baltimore city in the following spring of 1859. In a few weeks a large number of business men with their families prepared to return with him, and forsaking the comforts and gayeties of city life to encounter the privations and stern realities of forest life in Oregon.

On the 10th day of May, 1859, they all arrived in San Francisco on the steamer "Uncle Sam" from New York and on May 23d landed at Port Orford.

What follows we are permitted to quote from an old letter written by Dr. Hermann himself over 24 years ago, and being written by himself and in the midst of the scenes which it describes, can be relied on as authentic Hon. The first night we landed at Myrtle Grove farm, then but recently settled by "Doc" Lowe, who was then encamped in company with his brother "Pate." Here we were cordially welcomed by the kind families of the Messrs. Lowe. and hospitably en tertained at their forest camp. This marred all future enjoyment of the trip, now so near its ending, and cast a ing of the lodge to be held on Saturday, gloom and grief over the whole party all showing deep-felt sympathy.

"The two boats had become separated, and the one from which the acci. dent happened, was a mile behind. "You may imagine my feelings when Prof. Leoni gave the citizens of Roseburg I saw the boat nearing the shore and my son Binger lying apparently lifeless and stretched out in the boat. I soon heard the whole sad story. The boat was loaded with baggage and provisions; William Schroeder was sitting en a pile of carpet bags and in a drowsy condition fell overboard. "While still mourning with our respected friend Schroeder and his be reaved family, it was not over one week after, that we had to deplore another unexpected loss in one of the worthiest men of our party, a Mr. Wilde, a cigar maker from Baltimore city. He was returning with some friends from claim which he had picked out for his future home, and while going through the thick brush and carrying his rifle in his hand, the trigger was caught in the bushes, and in the act of looking back and pulling the rifle towards him, he was shot dead. He left a wife and two children, who awaiting his return at meal time, received his lifeless remains, and mourned their untimely loss at a moment when he had selected a beautiful location for his future permanent home. This death was followed in a succeeding week by another; that of William Duke, an old companion and friend of Captain Harris, my neighbor, and from the accidental discharge of a rifle, causing instant death. "Following these in quick succession I had my valuable library, surgical instruments and medicines swamped in the river by the capsizing of a scow; and farming implements by a sudden freshet; then the wreck of a ship near Coos bay, with considerable provisions tion. aboard, and then the destruction of a large quantity of choice fruit trees, and berry shrubbery and vines I had shipped from Sacramento nurseries, but the steamer not being able to land at Port Orford, the delay caused most of them

"Let us now leave the death scenes and other accidents by inscribing to the departed ones the usual requiescat in pace, and turn to the more agreeable scenes of life, the more so as the gods of the waters and the earth seem to be appeased by our sacrifices, for since then we have had no death in the whole length and breadth of our settle-

> The railroad company have an undoubted right to give any name they choose to their play. stations, but some regard should be paid to the nomenclature that has existed for forty vears. In going through southern Oregon the officers seem to believe they are passing through an undiscovered country and are giving new names to the places which are already fixed in the history of the country. For instance, Wolf creek has been changed to Almaden. If one of the old settlers on Wolf creek, who saw the Indians hung at the Six-bit house, was aboard the train, the brakeman's cry of Almaden would convey no meaning and he would probably stay on board until put off by the conductor. At new points new names are permissible, but we do pretest against giving new names to the old landmarks.
