

Presidential Talk.

Since the time and place for holding the national Republican convention has been definitely located, a number of the leading bosses are out in open letters intended to shape the campaign and the same time present their personal claims for the party nomination.

This article is entirely correct, with these exceptions: First, Fort Lane was not in existence in 1832. Second, Fort Lane was never attacked by Indians, and third, Fort Lane never was a fort. It was a two-company cavalry post, built by Captain (now General) A. J. Smith, in the fall and winter of 1853-4.

SENeca SMITH has been appointed by Governor Moody judge of the Circuit court, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Judge Stott. The appointment is satisfactory to a majority of the Portland bar.

Blaine is out in an open bid for the presidency, in which he is trying to play the role of the great decliner. In his letter he claims to have struck the happy medium and suggests a way of disposing of the surplus revenue without reducing the price of manufactured articles.

Protection doesn't seem to be exactly what it is claimed for the working man. Last winter the tariff on wool was cut down at the earnest solicitation of the woolen manufacturers of New England, they claiming that unless they got cheaper raw material their employees would be compelled to work for lower wages.

History. A late number of the Hesperian contains, under the head of "Relics of the Indian War," the following: When Mr. T. J. Matlock was in southern Oregon, says the vindicator, a few weeks ago, he made a trip to the ruins of old Fort Lane in quest of relics.
