GO AND LEARN HOW TO AVOID disease, and how wonderfully the arrangement of sentences by different authors, that it requires both eyes open and even on the alert to take in at a glance the whole construction. As the expert performer in music is able to take in the entire score at a glance, so the eye of the reader must view the sentence. The second qualification is the power of analysis. Every reader, like the dissecting surgeon, must in his mind tear all the parts of the sentence to pieces, to see the peculiar relation of each part to the whole sentence and then reconstruct them so as to give his hearers the complete meaning of the author. The meaning of a sentence is often conveyed by the position of its dependent parts and for this reason the reader cannot be too careful in observing the shade of thought intended to be conveyed by the peculiar construction of the sentence. Closely allied to this thought of analysis is expression in reading. The light and shades of thought may be varied in the same sentence by the mere force of expression. So the reader more than the author has the power to vary the meaning of a sentence, by reading it in a proper or improper manner. Language which may have seemed dull and meaningless to us, may be made to glow with light and sparkle with jewels of truth in the hands of a good reader. Usually too little attention is given to expression in the school room. Good reading is more than the hush-drum method of calling out the words. If we could get our scholars to enter heartily into the meaning and spirit of the author and make the language and thoughts their own, it would give life and energy to the exercises and relieve it from the unpleasant and irksome duty it too often becomes. Another requirement to good reading, and that is the cultivation of the voice. Upon this depends much of the pleasure and enjoyment of listening to the reader. Though he may possess all other qualifications, if the voice be harsh and grating, or if there is lack of proper emphasis and inflection, much of the pleasure of listening is destroyed. There must be stress and volume of voice, and yet so produced, as to sound sweet and musical. The best results in the cultivation of the voice can only be attained by careful training of the vocal organs, such as exercises in breathing, a thorough drill in the oral elementary sounds and classroom practice in reading.

READING.

A paper read by Mrs. W. A. Smith before the Teachers' Association recently held at Myrtle Creek.
To be a good reader is no mean accomplishment, but like all true culture it cannot be attained without effort and discipline. They who would become such, must make up their minds to meet the difficulties in their way with a determination to overcome them. To read well is not a natural endowment; but some through early training and opportunities find the road to success much easier than others who so trouble with some impediment of speech or whose early training has been deficient or erroneous. It is always more difficult to correct a bad habit, than to begin at the foundation and learn to apply the principles of good reading as you advance in your course of training. When we consider the pleasure and satisfaction to ourselves of reading well, it is worth all the patient discipline that we must undergo to attain it. But yet higher and more noble than mere selfish ambition is the ability to entertain and instruct others. We ought then to be good readers for our own enjoyment as well as the pleasure for our fellowmen. It is evident that the ability to read well for others requires more diversity of talent than to read only for our own enjoyment. In the one case the purpose is to get a clear and lucid understanding of the meaning of the author for one's self; in the other to convey that meaning to others. In the one the understanding is principally brought into play to know the meaning of words and apply the principles of analysis, to note the different shades of thought and expression; but in the other there is added to this the ability to convey these ideas to others by the different modulations of the voice and gestures. In our treatment of the subject we will confine ourselves to the heart of public reading, believing it includes also the more limited ability to read for one's own personal enjoyment. It seems that the first qualification of a good reader is the power to use the eyes aright. The reader has to do with language in the form of sentences. The first glance of the eye must comprehend the sentence as a whole, then the sentence in all its component parts, the peculiar relation which any word or adjunct bears to every other in the sentence. So flexible is the English language in its construction, so varied are the arrangement of sentences by different authors, that it requires both eyes open and even on the alert to take in at a glance the whole construction. As the expert performer in music is able to take in the entire score at a glance, so the eye of the reader must view the sentence. The second qualification is the power of analysis. Every reader, like the dissecting surgeon, must in his mind tear all the parts of the sentence to pieces, to see the peculiar relation of each part to the whole sentence and then reconstruct them so as to give his hearers the complete meaning of the author. The meaning of a sentence is often conveyed by the position of its dependent parts and for this reason the reader cannot be too careful in observing the shade of thought intended to be conveyed by the peculiar construction of the sentence. Closely allied to this thought of analysis is expression in reading. The light and shades of thought may be varied in the same sentence by the mere force of expression. So the reader more than the author has the power to vary the meaning of a sentence, by reading it in a proper or improper manner. Language which may have seemed dull and meaningless to us, may be made to glow with light and sparkle with jewels of truth in the hands of a good reader. Usually too little attention is given to expression in the school room. Good reading is more than the hush-drum method of calling out the words. If we could get our scholars to enter heartily into the meaning and spirit of the author and make the language and thoughts their own, it would give life and energy to the exercises and relieve it from the unpleasant and irksome duty it too often becomes. Another requirement to good reading, and that is the cultivation of the voice. Upon this depends much of the pleasure and enjoyment of listening to the reader. Though he may possess all other qualifications, if the voice be harsh and grating, or if there is lack of proper emphasis and inflection, much of the pleasure of listening is destroyed. There must be stress and volume of voice, and yet so produced, as to sound sweet and musical. The best results in the cultivation of the voice can only be attained by careful training of the vocal organs, such as exercises in breathing, a thorough drill in the oral elementary sounds and classroom practice in reading.

Rather too Charming.

Mr. E. W. S. Tingle has just paid a visit to Tacoma and Seattle, where he went to look over the field with a view to starting a daily somewhere in that far Western land, according to the Minneapolis Tribune. Mr. Tingle is very enthusiastic over the country, and thinks that it is a trifle more like the original Garden of Eden than any place he has seen of late years. "When you climb over the Rocky mountains it is like getting over the garden wall," he said in a burst of enthusiasm. "I am thoroughly convinced that it was on this spot that the Deity smiled his sweetest smile. Flowers bloom perennially in that sunny land, and the murmur of the cowslips as they raise their heads in the balmy air chime in with singing of the birds to form the most entrancing melodies. The breadfruit trees grow luxuriantly in Seattle, and I discovered one variety on which grew very bread with carryaway seeds in it, such as is often imported and used on free lunch counters of our modern civilization. Flamingoes and other tropical birds are common there, and in streams abound purple mullet and goldfish. I caught some of the latter. I have seen roses there growing on bushes as large as the ink rollers of my late printing press, while the rose leaves are so large and succulent that the citizens fry them and use them for food. Attar of roses is a common beverage, and the entire community is very sweet scented by reason of this fact. At Tacoma the whole picture is duplicated. Nature has not spared her bounties there. I was shown some samples of wood that grew on the hydraulic rams. I am convinced that a factory for the manufacture of hydraulic rams could do a paying business at wool growing. Cows are kept there for their beef alone, for the ingenious citizens have reduced the cultivation of the milk weed to such a high degree that they furnish all that is needed in the way of dairy products. Some of those milk weeds produce the richest kind of cream, and as the warm breezes vary them to and fro, this cream soon turns to butter by the gentle undulations. I think a newspaper could be made to bring in a rich return to its owner. "The country printing there is very fat, for it seems to keep pace with other native products. Carrier pigeons are trained to visit merchants and solicit subscriptions, and they do this with an intelligence that is remarkable. The printing press could be run by water power, and under that clear sky and healthy atmosphere I am convinced that the office boy would soon acquire the habit of writing leading editorials and condensed paragraphs. So the running expenses are bound to be light. It is possible that I am too conservative in my views, but I cannot help saying that I was favorably impressed with the entire country which I visited.

After Sugar in Nebraska.
Nebraska, it is said, will enter this year upon the manufacture of beet root sugar on a scale of some magnitude. Those who will engage in the culture are mostly Germans who have been skilled in the raising of the sugar beet in the old country, and a large sum has been subscribed to secure the production of the beet sugar in the market. It is said that the soil is adapted to the cultivation of beets and the climate favorable, but this can be claimed only after the experiment has been fully tried.

Washington's father died when the future president was 12, Jefferson's when he was 14, Jackson's before he was born, Madison's when he was a youth, Garfield's when he was a mere baby, Harrison the elder's before he had reached his majority, Tyler's when he was thirteen, Johnson's when he was four, and Hayes' and Cleveland's when they were young boys. The characters of nearly all of these were modeled by their mothers.—Ex

There were but two living ex-presidents to take part in the centennial exercises. It is a notable fact there were but two out of seven presidents, viz: John Quincy Adams and Andrew Jackson, living at the time of the celebration of the semi-centennial fifty years ago.
