There is at least one of the army of eastern tourists that is now returning home well convinced with the unapproachable reatness and wonderful possibilities of this section. A matronly, well-to-do appearing woman hailing from New York and out for a trip on pleasure bent, was among the recent arrivals at the Umatilla House. She was evidently not well satisfied with what she had seen and thirsted for something new concerning the country that she could tell to her friends on her return. This she confided to Col. Sinnott, the urbane host, and he lost no time in giving to his guest a history of the early periods in The Dalles' existence. Graphically he discoursed upon the resources of the country, but not until he had described how, in earlier days, he used to cross the lordly Columbia astride a salmon, and how George Francis Train once walked half way across the river on the same kind of fish and filling his pockets with samlets did the wonder-stricken tourist express a doubt of the correctness of the stories. Even then her doubts were quickly dispelled when she was shown the signature of the notorious globe trotter upon the register of the hotel, and she believes it all. The reminiscence of the cold winter of '79, when the river troze solid to ruptedly flow above the ice, struck her as more than usually peculiar, but when she looked the mild-eyed colonel full in the face and saw how earnest he was she knew it could only be the truth. The amiable tourist highly compliment her host saving she had secured more real knowledge of the wild and woolly west from him than all
