As quickly as possible a large crowd of excited people ran to the scene of the conflagration, and found the wrapped in flames. Very little water was available, and the only way of saving the structure was by tearing down some of the sheds, and thus allow the destroying element to exhaust itself. This was actively done, and to the efforts of John Dexter, Ed. Mays and others whose names we would gladly publish if we knew them, the remainder of the stables were saved. There were some of our leading citizens who formed a bucket brigade, and kept the sides water. At the first alarm the greatest ex-
