SWEENEY'S STATEMENT.

In announcing the calling off of the Switchmen't Union strike, Grand Master Sweeney said: "The conclusion reached by the duly authorized committee is to declare the trouble ended, and I have sanctioned this action. We cannot fight eight thousand militiamen and a dozen railroad corporations."

The way in which Grand Master Sweeney makes this statement is calculated to convey a very erroneous impression of the situation to those whe have not watched the course of the switchmen's strike, says the San Francisco Chronicle. Sweeney would have it believed, evidently, that the militia of New York were ordered out to prevent the switchmen from exercising Amsworth for rebate of taxes was read, and their natural and unquestioned right of refusing to work for the wages which the railroad companies offered from illegal assault and destruction.

As between the striking switchmen and the railroad corporations the militia have not sought or attempted to interfere. They have not even taken the place of the strikers in the work of handling trains, but they have seen to it that the property of the railroad companies was not destroyed, and that the operation of the roads should not have plans and estimate of cost made of a be illegally hindered or prevented. If that be what Grand Master Sweeney calls "fighting eight thousand militia" defeat from the people of the United

The real cause of the defeat of the switchmen's strike was not the presence of the militia, but the fact that the railroad companies were able to from the decision of the board of equalizaand that the other railroad organizations, such as the engineers, firemen, etc., declined to go on strike purely carry on a strike successfully must be assured of the endorsement of a large proportion of the people of the counwhere not already rebuilt.

One of a child of beauty rare, with a cherub face and golden hair. Filled the soul with thoughts of Paradise Side by side, in their frames of gold, Dingy and dusty, cracked and old,

A youthful painter found one day And moved by the beauty that it bore-On a canvas radiant and grand, He painted its face with a master hand Year after year on his wall it hung, Twas ever joyful and always young

Driving away all thoughts of gloom Like an Angel of light it met his gaze Bringing him dreams of his boyhood days; Filling his soul with a sense of praise, His raven ringlets grew thin and gray; His young ambition all passed away. Yet he looked for years in many a place, To find a contrast to that sweet face.

Through haunts of vice in the night To find some ruin that crime had made, At last in a prison cell he caught A glimpse of the hideous fiend he sought. On a canvas weird and wild but grand,

His task was done, 'twas a work sublime; An angel of joy and a fiend of crime, A lesson of life from the wreek of time, O crime with ruin thy road is strewn, The brightest beauty the world has known Thy power has wasted, till, in the mind,
