The Temescal tin mine, like every mine, is an experiment. There is tin ore there, as has been amply demonstrated; but whether the lodes or veins are of sufficient depth and extent to be worked profitably can be ascertained only by actual tests. It is, then, in opposition to this attempt to develop a domestic industry and one that may prove of of the mine the interests of the state. If there is a valuable tin mine at Temescal it should be daveloped; if it is not worth working, that can be stated only after thorough exploitation. In either case it is a foolish and shortsighted policy to try to kill the industry in Its present experimental stage, and to kill
