Change is rest, and it is beneficial even to an editor to take a few hours recreation in company with Mr. Chas. J. Stubling and Mr. W. E. Walther, we took a ride to Centerville, Wash., behind a span of blacks.

These days the ferry is always busy crossing and recrossing wheat wagons, and it was our misfortune to be forced to wait until a The Daily Oregonian says: Pacific Unihalf dozen had found their way from the versity and its preparatory department, boat to terra firms. Passing several pleasant homes, with well filled barns and thrifty orchards around was perfecting entrancing. Mt. To the left was Jefferson, looking like a younger brother to the hoary headed Hood, and to the right, Adams bmiling in the sunlight, and the range of the Simcoes appearing like an elongated base, on which the Great Architect had builded this massive pile of rocks and ice. It was foggy when behind the same span of horses, we comfortably seated ourselves on our return home; but Sam Thurman held the lines, and the time passed pleasently listening to his truthful (?) stories of stagedriving in the Rockies, the Sierras and Calapooias. It was a surprise to us that so modest-appearing a young man could spin such yarns. The early, damp mist hugged us in a chilling embrace, until we crossed the summit and saw outlined in silvery brightness, away below, the winding Columbia, and old Hood, seated on his high, majestic throne, in the cloudy distance. Our imagination had been very vivid, and in the must around us we could see written in many grotesque shapes the word, "copy," as this spurred us to greater diligence to lines of wheat wagons were wending their way to the river, and about half-past 10 o'clock we were seated with tablet in hand, and pencil moving rapidly to satisfy the unending din around our ears.
