Picking up large rock he hit one of them in the head and felled him. Jumping on the prostrate nimal, he unbuttoned his suspenders and securely tied him. Looking up into the tree, he saw the other one perching on a limb, and gathering a pile of rocks he commenced an onslaught and soon brought him to the ground. This time he had no suspenders, but had recourse to his shoe strings. By the time he had commenced operations, the cougar was fully resuscitated. and a desperate struggle ensued; but Sam was successful, and, although his clothes were torn from him and he was scratched in several places by the claws of the infariated animal Patterson had him tied with tough thouge of buckskin. In this condition, Sam. hauled them to his home, and placed them in a strong cage. Mr. Patterson was accompanied by a late arrival from the east, who stood at a safe distance during the encounter, and desired his neutrality to be properly respected by both parties.
