The screams of the woman and been treated cavalierly in many ways by the shouts of Guilland brought a gang of graders to the rescue. Thereupon summoned more Italians and a pitched battle ensued. The railway men gathered in a group, with Guilland and the woman in the center, and began to retreat slowly, firing as they went and calling for belp as they fell back. Others joined them and finally they made a stand. The Italians pressed them closely and it seemed for a time as though the railroad men would be wiped out, but eventually their superior armament, most of them having revolvers, saved them. Many, however, were badly cut by knives and wounded by stones and other missiles thrown by the Italians Both parties gradually broke up into small bands and scattered through the town Guilland and the woman were spirited away to a place of safety. Fighting between small parties continued in different parts of the town until daylight. No definite statement as to the number of
