Verdict of Murder.

DUFUR, Ore., May 28, 1894. About 9:80 o'clock Saturday morning a young man called upon Dr. Dietrich at his office in Dufur and urgently requested him to attend a wounded companion whom he said was accidentally shot and lying at a camp about twenty miles above Dufur, and on Fifteen Mile creex. The stranger was heavily armed, having in some instances, very valuable appliances three or more revolvers in convenient places about his person, and soon was recognized as Jack Hawthorne, one of The Dalles robbers. Nearly everyone in town had some extra good plan to effect his capture as soon as he became known. but the fellow remained an hour or more Coroner Eastwood was notified and appointed Judge Brigham to hold an invuest on the remains, and a jury, accompapied by Dr. Dietrich and a JIMES-MOUNTAINEER correspondent, proceeded to the scene of action.

Alter a thorough post mortem examina tion, Dr. Dietrich reported that there were two gunshot wounds on the bodyone bullet entering the abdomen in the right groin, and was found and extracted on the right side of the spinal column near the third lumbar vertebra, it being so near the surfice that the skin was broken; the second wound was from a large calibre gun and entered the right temple, ranged a little forward and passed directly through the brain, causing instant death.

From appearances it is evident that Hawthorne told the truth regarding the accidental shooting of the abdominal wound, and from its nature it is extremely doubtful if the victum eyer recovered consciousness after that shot was fired but when Hawthorne returned from Dufur, and lourd that his wounded companion could not be taken along, he, and his companion deliberately put a shee three feet more will bring it over the rait- under one side of the body, to get it into the desired position, and fired a bullet through the brain, justifying themselve with the saying of "Dead men tell no
