A DANGEROUS PROCEEDING

Theodore Durrant appears to have another lease on life, his attorney having applied to the federal courts for a writ of habeas corpus, which was denied by the lower court and the matter has been appealed to the U.S. supreme court. This of course will delay the execution of the murderer, and possibly may yet result in saving his

It is probable, however, that the supreme court will refuse to consider the matter, since it has been the policy of the federal courts to not interfere with state courts, and this policy should serve as a precedent in the present case. For, were the U.S. supreme court to recognize this appeal, and take any steps to prevent the carrying out of the judgment of the state court, it would set a precedent that would make the state judiciary inoperative. There would continually be a clash of authority. Every case of importance decided by the state courts, whether civil or criminal, would be carried into the federal courts, and there would be no end to litigation. It is indeed in the interest of justice that the two courts should be kept widely separated. each having a distinct class of business to consider, but neither should interfere with the other. If the U.S. supreme court should consider Durrant's case, and order a writ of habeas corpus issued, it would open the gates to a system of litigation that would be never ceasing, and would establish a precedent that would be most dangerous in the future.

NATIONAL BANKING SYSTEM.

Among the many laws upon our there is probably none that are more banks. When the law creating money. national banks was first enacted it was at a time when the finances of the country required revising, and it was held up as a method to induce resident capitalists to carry the ponded debt of the nation and at the same time supply a flexible and safe paper currency. The law was consequently crude in its form, and the amendments that have been added have been no improve-

This is the vilest kind of demagogy. If it were the lack of confidence in the money standard that stagnated business in past years, business would have resumed its normal conditious, as the Oregonian promised, immediately after McKinley's election, for by his election the people were assured that the nation would be on a single gold standard during his administration of four years. We can now have no hope or fear of going to a silver standard for four years. We know our money will be based upon gold until 1901, for it cannot be changed until another president shall have been elected and inaugurated. Hence if it were a lack of confidence in the money standard that prevents the revival of business, that has been removed, and every branch of business should now be flourishing.

But the real cause is not in a lack of confidence in the class of money that is to be adopted. It is a lack of vol-Oregonian. ume of money.
