There may be several causes. The barrenness may be in the variety, as the Northern Spy; it may be caused by a soll too rich, or by over cultivation. The last two conditions are most common, and are not infrequent in Oregon. It is one of the three, I River and the fourth district. Orchardists have these methods of bringing trees into bearing: Root praning. ummer pruning and sowing some crop

Root pruning, ny cut ing off a part of the food sapply, deprives the leaves of their usual neurishment, and prevents their using the nutritions matter on hand. The branches are therefore retarded in their growth, food accumulates and fruit buds are formed, be cause the energies of the tree are diverted from plant-growth to fruitbud formation. Root pruning is accomplished by digging a trench the width of a spade at a radius of several feet from the trunk and from two to three feet deep. In so doing enough of the roots will be cut to secure the object sought, and should be performed in winter. The treatment is somewhat harsh, and must be done very judiciously. In summer pruning, by depriving a tree of part of its lollage, the exuberance of growth is checked, because the dered. Summer pruning is best accomplished by cutting off a few of the smaller branches not required in formyoung shoots have made a growth of several inches; by pinching them back two or three inches, fruit spurs will be the result. It is easy to overdo summer pruning, and the remedy should be resorted to only when absolutely necessary, and then care must be ex-

The last remedy for pon-bearing trees is most frequently employed, and week in advanced sections, and thus a has the least objectionable features. In an orchard where the soil is so rich that trees become too luxuriant in foliage a crop of grain for one year is a very effectual and convenient way of throwing the tree into bearing. U. P.
