INDIAN DIVORCES.

Summary Proceedings of the Dissatisfied Married Brave. teant Ceremony Used in Casting Off

the Galling Yoke Which Binds

Him to His Objection able Squaw. With most of the plains Indians marriage consists simply in picking out the maiden, leading her to a cabin or wigwam, and installing her as mistress of the nouse and cornfield, sometimes with the necessary preliminary of paying the father a pony or two or an installment father a pony or two or an installment slight ceremony performed by chief or medicine man. And when the brave grows tired of his partner he can get rid of her as easily as he won her. The people who are now flocking to the Dakotas or Oklahoma to get divorces would be supremely happy if they could throw off the galling bonds of wedlock as easily as does the reserva tion Indian. The fact having been for mally announced by the head man of the clan, the divorce takes place when its cargo of grain went to the bottom | the tribe is gathered at a dance. When all are assembled and the circle formed, the discontented warrior strikes a drun used by the revellers, (gives away a few presents (ofttimes making a present to the squaw he intends to take next), and then, in a short, bombastic speech, he attached to the officers of either ves- stigmatizes his wife by giving her over to the tender mercies of other braves, while they look upon him enviously and consider that he has performed an act of bravery in his desertion. Often as many as half a dozen divorces are thus obtained at a single dance; no tedious waiting, no courts, no lawyers, and no trouble about alimony or the custody of the children And the squaws thus cast off as a general thing seem to take it as a matter of course, and before the close of the dance are using the wiles known and used by the women of the world over in an ef the break in their hearts and matrimo nial experience. With the taking of land in severalty and putting on of citizenship, however the Indian finds that he has cemented the ties that were so loose before, for the courts everywhere are deciding that the tribal marriages are legal and binding upon the Indian who becomes a citizen. And if the weight of one legal marriage wears somewhat heavily upon a white man, how must it be with the red man who has contracted two, three four, or even more alliances which the court now declares legal and at the same time takes away his former av

The first court divorces ever given any member of the southwest reservation tribes was granted in the district tourt at El Reno several weeks ago. The fair plaintiff in the case was a fullblooded Kiowa girl, whose name was something like Beahl Koo, but perhaps it had never before been so reduced to writing until it appeared upon the records of the court. She was totally unfamiliar with the English language, and it was necessary to tell her troubles by the aid of an interpreter, but the trouble was to find some one that could inter-pret the weird dialect of Kiowa. Judge Jack Stillwell, the ex-scout, was present, and, although quite familiar with the Comanche tongue, he was compelled to confess that he could not handle Kiowa. A way was soon found whereby she could tell her tale of woe to Judge Burford. Caddie Konkie (Black Crane), a leading member of the Kiowa tribe, and a very intelligent man was present, and while he could not talk English, he could speak Kiowa, and interpret it into Comanche, and Judge Stillwell then interpreted it into English. She stated that she was not quite 16 years of age, and that she had been married to a white man named King for three years, but that he had left her over two years ago, and that she was now living with her parents After hearing all the facts the court granted her privilege to assume her maiden name, or any other name she

At the next term of the district court at Tologo, D county, however, will be presented an application for divorce the like of which is without a parallel and the judge and attorney will look in valu for precedent decisions in all the law reports extant.
