LIFE SAVING APPLIANCES.

Strange Things Offered In its endeavors to improve the tional marine life-saving systems the United States board for that purpose has recently examined a considerable number of appliances brought to its attention by inventors. Among these is a model of a serpentine ship, constructed by James Graham, the peculiar feature of which is that the body of the ship will revolve in the water and the occupants will be in an interior cylinder. Perhaps a more practical idea is that presented in the makeup of life preservers as developed by C. Moller of Norway, who has made a padded vest and used reindeer hair for padding, the claim being that such hair, whether dry or wet, is as buoyant as cork and more durable. In behalf of this latter device it was urged before the board that life preservers or belts made of canvas and filled with reindeer hair have the desirable advantage of giving to the user more freedom of action, while there is also less liability to catch obstructions or to injure the hands by contact when rowing.
