REVERTES OF SUMMER.

The last rese of summer is dead. And the leaves are now dead on the trees, The sweet woodland song birds have fled To the south, with its wild balmy breeze. We have roamed in the sweet-scented bow-

Wher the woodlands in glorious array Were gorgeously covered with flowers, But their beauty has all passed away. And a situace so painful—so sad— Falls pensive and deep in our heart; Not a sound, not a voice, that seems glad, Do the wonders of nature impart. And so with our summer-time joys. They are sweet but they soon passaway; Some canker worm comes and destroys Their beauty or life in a day, And then all is sadness and gloom, l'elipsed is our summer of Joy, And we sigh for a region of bloom, Where naught can our pleasures destroy.

We cannot trust nature for bliss, For all is describe and vain, For what we love best we first miss, And the flower never blossoms again. The sweet voice in silence is hushed, An i the form almost angel-like fled: No pleasure on earth can we trust, As we weep o'er the graves of our dead.

But when nature's God we shall see, In the beguifful land far away, Eterned our summer shull be, And our joys never blight or decay. In that land is no parting or pain. And a cloud never shadows the sky:

It's the land where the loved meet again-We call it the "sweet bye and bye." SOPHIA V. WHEELER HUMPHREY. Portland, Oregon.

But if they could see themselves, as others of different gon, tastes see them, they would, had they any respect for themselves or others, most certainly desist. It might be well for young men knowing themselves given to the use of such detestible language, to refrain hereafter and cultivate a better tone.

Every man in town, especially every business man, should use all due influence toward building up the town in which he lives and does business, no matter how small that business. Every man has some influence, and if all the citizens of a place are united and active in using their influence for that comes from persistent and earnest efforts, and no town, village or city has ever amounted to anything if their citizens sat with folded hands awaiting for the "good time coming."
