how man bimself had been serving different masters, passions and cramped teachings, since his inauguration into the schools of being. He saw how all the upward flights of man had been checked by some passion or ambition, tied like a rope, as it were, to what was low and unrefined. And he saw finally that just as he had risen, in the nobler walks, woman had risen, step by step, little by little, with him, and how, at last, when the last chord of tyrany was snapped from the feet of manhood, and man bounded out fearless and free, woman had been long suffering and patient, and bounded as far out and deep into freedom as he did. She began to see in the newer day, the dawn of a newer day, also, of womankind. Her faculties began to expand under the soft sunshine of liberty. There were fields she had never trod, but where her soul longed to wander, and now, that she was free and light-hearted, she soared aloft and tried the pinions that bigotry had compelled to be tied down. In literature she revelled; in art she flourished. Homes were made happier and more joyous in the sunlight of her new knowledge and new freedom. No more was she afraid to speak or think, There were arms waiting to embrace in hearty approval her thoughts and words. Public sentiment listened as the tuned the lyre to nobler and tenderer strains. And so the powers long kept down, at last have bloomed and blossomed. The being that is said to have caused man's first great fall and his tree disobedience, has rewarded him with grander thoughts and prettier sentiments, with purer examples and holier attainments than a thousand paradises would equal. Eden has been regained in the establishment of woman's domain, public and privatein tearing from her limbs the chords that uncient man tied there. The primeval fathers would blush to-day at their bigotry and narrowness, if they were here to read "Beulah" or "Uncle-Tom's Cabin," They would shudder in awe at the narrow limit in which they confined their wives and daughters, if they could see our American women teaching and lecturing-making homes happy with their unsullied refinement and unbound minds. Abraham would hide his head for shame at the thoughts of the treatment Hagar received at his hands if he could walk into some of our homes today and behold the love, the peace the fortitude and faith that reigns in even

WASHINGTON.

An Interesting Latter from Our Regular Correspondent at the Capital.

WASHINGTON, (D. C.) Jan. 17, 1890. EDITOR OREGON SCOUT :-

The death of Walker Blaine is the first death of any prominent person in Washington' from "la grippe." On Thursday, less than a week before his death, Mr. Blaine attended the reception to Mrs. Gen Gran', where he contracted the cold which prostrated him. From the first the symptoms were chills and pains throughout the in public life. He was literally brought up in luxurious public positions. He was third Secret ry of State when his father was in President Garfields eachiest. While thus employed

In 1883 he was appointed junior counsel for the United States before the Alabama claims court. From 1886 to 1889 Walker Blaine was out of office, and was employed as railroad attorney, with little to do and plenty of assistants to do it for him. Within two weeks after rosted according to law on January, 2, 1890, President's Harrison's inauguration Mr. Blaice was nominated examiner of claims in the State department, which made him the confidential representative of the Secretary. Walker Blaine was a young man of decided abilities and vast experience. He had also creat push and energy, combined with complete confidence in himself. If his life teaches one lesson more than another, it is that there are many greater misfortunes than being born the e a of the foremost American politici. It.

S ca or Farwell's ire is still up against the administration. That he is only prevented from making a hitter attack upon President Harrison by the constant persuasion of his friends, is no secret. He is full of TOMBLESON BROS. fight, and longing for an opportunity. 1-16-m1

One thing he has announced that he will do anyhow. He will fight the appointment of Clark nominated as collector of customs for the port of Chicago without a consultation with either of the senators from Illinois. It is understood that Clark and Senator Farwell have been hitherto good friends and that the senator's opposition to his nomination is based upon a desire to vindicate his own honor, Mr. Farwell has been hard at work among his colleagues this week and is said to have received assurances of enough votes to defeat the nomination. This, however, is extremely doubtful.

The corridors in the census office and the superintendent's and chief clerk's rooms are a bedlam these days. One could pick up a respectable querum of the House of Representatives almost any day banging about to see Superintendent Porter about putting ome constituents on the rolls. Hundreds of applicants are present for themselves, willing to take any position no matter how small, but determined to get something. There are all sorts of people. Bright-eyed young girls, knowing young men, awkward country boys, blear-cyed old men and frowsy old women. Some look impertinent, others desperate, others sullen. The clerk who worked on the last census is a common figure. The men of this class are mostly of the blear-eyed order. They are the mysterious lower class majors who hang about hotel lobbies, from census to census it would seem, and upon whom time leaves no impression save to make clothes already shabby a trifle shabbier. They all "know Porter" and speak in affectionate confidence of what he has assured them shall be done for them. They all claim to be experts and feel that the success of the next census depends largely upon whether or no they are employed.

The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs held a special session this week to hear the views of the naval board of policy appointed last summer by Secretary Tracy to formulate and report a scheme for the improvement of the navy to the standard of that of a firstclass power. Commodore McCann, president of the board, Captain Simpson and Naval Constructor Gatewood did most of the talking. They approved in general terms the bill introduced by Senator Hale, which authorized the president to have constructed eight battle ships of from 7,000 to 10 -000 tons each, two armed coast vessels, three gun-boats of from 800 to 1,200 To Mark Edson, the above named defentons each and five first-class improved torpedo boats. The bill further appropriates $5,000,000 for construction answer to the complaint filed against you and $2,000,000 for armament, which latter sum it is expected would provide a most claborate and powerful gunnery. The policy board, in reporting to Secretary Tracy, will recommend the construction of 102 vessels of different type and size, to be built feed and the construction of the summons that the first day of the next regular term there of after the publication of this summons for structure of the summons for structure of the summons for structure of the next regular term there of after the publication of this summons for structure of the next regular term there of after the publication of this summons for structure of the next regular term there of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons of after the publication of this summons for structure of after the publication of this summons of after the publication of the str within fourteen years and to cost, all fendant, and for the care and custody of told, over two hundred and fifty mil-J.
