Those who are able to keep up extengive households with a retinue of trained servants experience less trouble and have less desire to change, as the mistress is usually far removed from the machinery which runs the establishment, and the social life of the domestics is better provided for. The mistress of such a house is free to follow any life or occupation she chooses and naturally cares for no alteration. But among the middle classes there is growing a discontent, an enger looking about for some new and freer method of living. Mistresses of small isolated homes are no longer satisfied with the glory of doing well in their humble and circumscribed fields. The lit-tle troubles, annoyances, small cares of households, wear out their lives, leaving very little to show for it. The confine ment prevents them from engaging in interesting, intellectual or financially profitable pursuits. They restlessly seek some means of escape. Then the women who are of necessity workers in general in their own homes —laundress, cook, nurse, teacher, hostess and household angel all in one—are in still greater depths of dissatisfaction and restlessness. They are grasping every excuse and every opportunity to get out of their grooves and engage in other occupations. If the husband has a busiess that will admit of the entrance of the wife, she will hire or coax some one to take her place in the home and work with him. The woman who has a mother, aunt or cousin to take her family off her hands considers herself fortunate. Whether we condemn or applaud, there is a growing disinclination among women to keep within the limits of home, and it is a significant and important fact.

But what is to be done? What will be the probable effect on social and economic conditions? Must we, to avert general chaos, take away such freedom as women have gained—compel them, will-ing or unwilling, to resume their old guarded and limited positions? Shall we still further endeavor to guild, bedeck and illumine their recognized spheres and lure them back? They have been kept there many, many years by our present-
