A very radical advance has been made in files by a mixture of a small portion of aluminium with the file steel. No one as yet has been able to explain the cause, but The Age of Steel says the face tremains unquestioned that the aluminium does make quite a pronounced change in the character of the steel.

In the first place, it renders the steel softer when the file is cut, so that the teeth are much cleaner and more evenly cut than with the regular file, and on the other hand when the file is hardened it gives a toughness and hardness unknown before, so that the result is a file that will do more work and with less clogging up than the ordinary file. It has been thoroughly tested and has given great satisfaction.

How the Ancients Engraved Gems How the Ancients Engraved Gems.
The art of gem engraving is a very ancient one, and it is a curious fact that the tools used in this work have changed less than any others known except perhaps the potter's wheel. In a lecture delivered at the Metropolitan museum in New York Professor Rood, in tracing the history of the art from the early Egyptians, through the Assyrians to the latter Greeks and Romans, stated that the bowstring drill and the disk as used in very early times did not differ materially from the tools in use at the present day, while the corundum point was ent day, while the corundum point was generally used for handwork.
