Looking at poultry from the standpoint of a market poultryman, the ques-tion assumes an entirely different aspect. Whether eggs or meat are wanted as a specialty the size of the fowls and the proportion of meat to offal must always considered, as sooner or later the laying stock must be disposed of on account of age, and then the advantage of weight is felt. In this connection a correspond-ent of The Fanciers' Journal thus sums up the matter. He says: Take Leghorns, for instance—verita-

THE VALUE OF STRAW.

It Is a Market Commodity-Listed on the On many farms, notably in the grain growing regions of the west, straw is considered a waste product. But a small proportion of it is put to any practical use besides bedding for stock. Near the cities and larger towns it becomes a marketable commodity, and the ex-change of straw for the manure made is a village custom.

In New York city straw is a regular market commodity listed on the Produce Exchange the same as hay and graded and subject to the same rules of inspection. The prices at which it sells render it an object to save it in the best possible condition, for only so is it val-uable. The Rural New Yorker says there are not so many different grades of straw as of hay, but all straw to sell for quoted prices must be in good con-

hay. There are two grades of this straw Some straw may be brought in loose, but practically it is all baled. The requireients for No. 1 rye straw are that it shall be clean, bright, long, sound pressed in bundles, well and securely baled. The bales of straw are usually larger than those of hay, and few if any are baled with the perpetual presses. Many of them have wood in the bales. No. 2 rye straw must possess the same requirements as No. 1, except that it is not pressed in bundles. Both these grades should be free from chaff. This straw is used largely by horsemen for bedding, by florists and nurserymen for packing flowers, plants and trees and to a less extent for other purposes.

Tansy And a PREVENTIVE TO FEMALE IRREGULARITIES. The exchange has given but one grade of oat straw, and all not filling the requirements laid down for this grade quirements laid down for this grade would have to be sold on its merits. Wheat straw is not graded, but differs but little from oat in the conditions to be met. It is used for much the same purposes and usually sells for about the same price. The market reports generally quote short rye straw in addition to No. 1 and No. 2. This is such as is not ong enough to be classed in either of the other grades, but otherwise must fill the requirements for them.

Hence sheep will pay as well or better than cattle or hogs, even if the wool only pays for the shearing. The conclusion is also reached in West Virginia, with lands and climate well adapted to this industry and situated so near the large cities of the east, where the consumption of mutton is continually increasing, that the growing and feeding of sheep for mutton is a business from which the largest profits may be realized by those who give the matter judicious management.
