A Poison Which Causes More Misery. Insanity and Murder Than All Others Combined-Its Action on Brain and Heart.

That a being of such mighty attainments as man, so powerful for good, may, under the influence of alcohol. polson of his own manufacture, sink so far as to lose his physical powers, his mental clearness and his moral responsibility is a sight crying out to heaven tice is a violation of nature's inexofor pity. Yet it is entirely voluntary. completely of his own free will. The drinking habit was never formed as the result of a drink forced upon a man against his wish. It is the result of his own repeated acts of drinking. Let us trace the effects of alcohol unon the various parts of the system and then consider its final influence upon the physical and mental well being of the human race.

First, what is alcohol, and how is it obtained? Alcohol is a colorless liquid. the principal ingredient in all forms of intoxicating drinks, and is obtained by the fermentation of substances containing sugar. Thus wines are made by fermenting the grape juice, which contains grape sugar; lager, ale and body in which its ruinous effects beporter are produced by fermenting grains and vegetables which contain malt sugar; spirituous liquors are obtained by distilling sugary substances directly, as molasses, which becomes theipate in the general breakdown rerum, of indirectly, as in the case of the sulting from its use .- Dr. John G. brandles made from grapes, apples and Coyle. penches, and whisky made from grains or notatoes whose starch is first con verted into sugar.

These various drinks differ greatly in their alcoholic strength, the differonce ranging from 6 to 8 per cent of alcohol in beer to 50 or 58 in brandy. This means that in beer one drop in 14 is pure alcohol and in brandy one drop in two. Different emotional effects are produced by different drinks, but the long continued practice of drinking even the milder forms of alcoholic beverages, such as beers or light wines, inrisk of losing money in such a scheme, variably causes the establishment of such desires and cravings as require the strongest forms to satisfy, so that the ultimate results are identical whether one form or the other be habitually taken. add a dollar to his fortune to pay

The first effect of alcohol is to increase the amount of gastric juice in the stomach, so that if food be present digestion is more easily accomplished, It is created. Hence the drinker will often urge this effect as an excuse for the toleration of the habit; but, like all the other immediate effects of nicohol, this gradually requires a larger amount for its production, so when one drink served at first two are afterward required, then three and eventually no amount will produce the desired effect. The next organ to feel the effect of alcohol is the heart. Entering the blood through the stomach, the alcohol is carried in a few seconds to the heart, where its presence makes that organ bent faster. The beart distribes the blood all over the system and, beating faster under the influence of the stimulant, sends more blood than before to the various parts of the body. Mounting to the brain, the blood carries the alcohol into that wonderful organ. The emotions are aroused, the thoughts flow more quickly, the sense pleasure is awakened, the eye brightens, the speech is loosened and the drinker becomes animated in coneffects of the alcohol wear away the person returns to his natural condition. Thus far I have described only the effect of a small quantity of alcohol. Even when confined to so small an amount of stimulation as this the poison still does barm, for these efects have been caused by the irritation of its fumes and, though the visible effects bave passed away, traces But when taken in larger quantities its effects become more apparent. Intoxication is a Greek word mean ing poison. The physician studying the effects of poisons finds that opium,

The abstainers were zealous propagandists, and after a time the temperance societies that adhered to the old antispirit platform died out or adopted the more thorough going basis, and the temperance movement became what it is today, a crusade against all intoxicants.

The only exceptions are the Church of England Temperance society and me other secturian organizations es tablished at a much later date which have a "dual basis," one section of "to tal abstainers" and the other of nonabstainers who are desirous of promoting temperance. The earliest instauce wn to me of the use of the word temperance is the title of the Young People's Temperance Society of Hector, in the state of New York, formed Aug. 22, 1820, whose pledge is against "intoxicating liquor."—Notes and Que-
