Little Boy Black.
Little Boy Black sat half the day
On the steps of the old red house,
Watching the little white boys at play,
Like a poor little frightened mouse.
He wondered why they passed him by,
With never a kind look back.
And why they'd play all a summer day,
But never with Little Boy Black.

Little Boy Black was five years old; His father and mother were dead;
His granny fought off hunger and cold
And gave him his milk and bread.
The boys would scan her little man
As the old fence he peeped through
And run away as they'd hear him say,
"I wish I was Little Boy Blue!"

Little Boy Black's small hands are crosse On his little white shrouded breast, And nevermore will his heart be tossed On the waves of his deep unrest.

His sobs and sighs, his sad, wet eyes
Are silent and caim tonight;
His soul has flown to a fairer zone,
Where Little Boy Black is white.
