A FARM WATER SUPPLY. Small Spring Made Very Useful In

The opening up of springs is often a very satisfactory means of obtaining a farm supply of irrigation water. Their development sometimes consists in the excavation of a reservoir in a piece of springy or marshy ground or in laying underdrains to take their flow and connecting them with a more convenient reservoir site at a distance. Some times a spring whose flow cannot be recovered from the area of boggy ground below it can be opened up and BOGHOLE BELOW A HILLSIDE SPRING its waters readily directed to a single channel or to a pipe leading to a reservoir (see the cuts). Professor Wickson of California in writing of field and garden irrigation tells how by this eans waste land which is both useless and treacherous is reclaimed and ide productive, while at the same time the waste water which destroyed it is utilized to make other lands more oductive.

Professor Wickson says: Many farms have blemishes of this kind to be reoved, and long and costly channels are cut merely to provide an outflow to a water course. It would often be less expensive to include a system of irrigation and thus to double the return for the necessary expenditure. Foul mudholes which are maintained for watering stock can be made to yield a wholesome water supply for stock and an irrigation supply for the farm carden by piping from the reservoir, which can be constructed on the site of the old mudhole at a little cost. All these improvements can be accomplished by the ordinary methods and materials for un dérground drainage. There is one matter in connection with a projected utilization for any small outcropping of water to which careful attention should be given, and that is approximate knowledge of the amount of water which can be made available. This may be obtained before investment of labor or material is made by opening up the spring thoroughly, cleaning it out to expose its outflow and measuring the flow in a - tiebt havin or a vessel of know capacity. Note the time required the vessel, and it can be quickly calculated how much the spring will yield in twenty-four hours. Almost every will be surprised at the result of the measurement. A trickle of water thought to be too insignificant for con-sideration will be found to yield a very effective continuous flow if the water

A five gallon oil can is a handy measure. Suppose the spring fills it in two minutes, the yield would then be 3,600 gallons in twenty-four hours, or 108,-000 gallops in one month, and this amount is equivalent to nearly four inches of rainfall on an acre of ground. Such an amount, if carefully collected and applied, would keep a garden of small fruits and vegetables in good growth even with very little rainfall if the soil be of a fairly retentive character. As a safety supply against the short droughts of the humid region it would rescue a crop which might be worth several hundred dollars. Thus a little outflow from a spring which might pass away unnoticed un derground or at most by surface flow would only make a sedgy streak across a corner of a field, can be made a potent factor in production. Of course in handling water from such a small source of supply it must be constantly protected from loss. It would disappear in an open ditch in a short time Usually it must be conveyed in a pipe to a tank or tight reservoir and collected in sufficient volume to cover quite an area at each application.

Connecticut Cloth Grown Tobacco Much is yet to be learned in growing tobacco under cloth tents. Speaking of a crop grown last year in Connecticut on quite heavy land, the New England Homestead says it is admitted by some Can Win a Victory This Year of the government experts to be one of the best in quality. This leaf seems to have more body in it than the very thin and papery leaf grown under cloth on lighter soils. There is much speculation among growers also as to how shaded leaf on light soil will cure down should the curing season happen to be quite dry instead of moist, as it

In reflecting upon developments since the prediction that he would before his of office expired succeed in "splitting the party wide open." History is accurately repeating itself-the president is following unmistakably in the footprints left in the sands of time by Andrew Johnson and Chester A. Arthur. In his effort to strengthen his administration and incidentally to insure for himself the presidential nomination in 1904 Mr. Roosevelt is making political enemies as well as political friends. In his policy of official readjustment, which is popularly known as "the distribution of patronage," the president is presenting to the Democratic party an opportunity that may easily be grasped, and the recent administrative acts of the president have reanimated issues upon which the Democrats caunot easily lose. There can be little doubt that the administration has aroused serious antagonism in not a few circles by his attitude toward the tariff, ship subsidies, the rallway merger, the army bill and by the singular infirmity of judgment manifested by the president in incidents personal in scope. In a word, Mr. Roosevelt has both in conduct and in manner persuaded unprejudiced critics that he is an uncertain and peculiar political force and withal a disturbing member in a political organization. His errors in judgment and his singularity in personal relations have won to his support the sympathy of few Democrats or independents and have driven from his side a large number of influential Republicans.
