passed over the actor. Had he been forgotten?

Never mind; he would show those who were there what he could do. When the curtain went up, the seats were but half filled. It nerved the star to action. Into the style to which he had been accustomed be threw an in-tensity which rendered it more marked even than before, more old fushioned. The audience sat silent as the gravestones of a cemetery, and before the play was half finished Raiford wished they were gravestones. In one scene where the hero is awakened by a villain ready to murder him he hoped to retrieve himself by a splendid coolness. He succeeded, but as he would have succeeded fifteen or twenty years be-
