MR. BOWSER GOES HUNTING.

After a moment's thought he knew that those stood for "keep your eye peeled," and he redoubled his vigilance. It was rewarded as he turned the next thicket. Something belched and bounded away from him. He drew up his gun and fired, and after the smoke blew away he saw a calf standing and facing him fifty feet away. In his ardor to get that wagon load of rabbits Mr. Bowser had not supposed to be efficient about tracks. With a heart full of thankfulness that Mrs. Bowser was not there and would never know about it, he passed on. Five minutes later he found other tracks.

He couldn't be fooled again. Here was real game afoot. Every print of the foot had the letter "R" branded in it, and "R" stands for rabbit, even in the new way of spelling.

Mr. Bowser took up the trail with fresh ardor. He followed it through thickets and over logs and across frozen ponds, and directly he found that it led across a meadow straight for the farmer's barn. He had only to recall his boy-hood days to realize that rabbits and barns are inseparably connected. The barn was the lair of the beast, and he should be dragged forth and slaughtered without mercy.

Clinging to the trail like a savage wolf to the footprints of a wounded buffalo, Mr. Bowser eventually reached the barn. In the open door in the winter's sunshine a cat sat looking her.

Had Mr. Bowser been given five minutes to think it through he would have connected the cat and the tracks and the barn together, but while he was looking from one to the other and scratching his head a farmer and his two grown sons appeared in the door back of the cat. The farmer's dog also appeared, coming from the house, and, feeling that he had been remiss in his vigilance, he made up for it now by nipping Mr. Bowser in the leg.

"By thunder!" exclaimed the Nimrod as he drew up his gun to shoot.

"Hold on there!" cried the three men in chorus as they rushed out. One by one they nipped Mr. Bowser in the leg.

"What in the devil do you suppose I keep a dog for except to bite tramps?" retorted the farmer.

"I am no tramp, as you very well know. Sir, there is a law against keeping savage dogs, and I want damages or I will appeal to it. Was it to say that this bite won't give me hydrophobia?"

Ordered Off the Farm. "And who is to care whether it does or not? What right have you got trespassing on my land? What are you doing here, dressed up like some dime museum freak? By Jove, if you are not over the fence in two minutes me and the boy will throw you over!"

There could be but one ending to the situation. Mr. Bowser had tracked a calf. He had tracked a cat.

He had been bitten by a dog without excuse. His face got red, and his gorge rose. His eyes snapped, and his ears worked. He would have taken it out on Mrs. Bowser if he could, but she was far away, and the farmers were near by.

He drew a long breath and told the three men of his hunt. "What are you doing here, dressed up like some dime museum freak? By Jove, if you are not over the fence in two minutes me and the boy will throw you over!"
