HUMAN DEPRAVITY.

It seems astounding at times what depths of human depravity may be and are reached by mankind within our k en, and within whom the world at large would otherwise placethe utmost confidence. The tendency to utter debasement seems inherent in some natures, and the worst of it is that not even their closest friends suspect anything of the kind until the expose comes. Sometimes this expose comes, but in many cases we should judge that it does not, and the person breaking all laws of nature goes on until his death posing as one of our highest minded and most respectable citizens. It is not so awful many years ago that one Oscar Wide had all England at his feet, and subsequently the higher sets of the big cities of the eastern states, because of his adoption of a particular bizarre dress and outrageous effectness that won him many followers and threatened for a time to make our dudes the laughing stock of all sensible people. The decovery of his true nature came early enough however to stop the fad in its infancy, and was probably a Godsend in more ways than one. When it became known that his supposedly cultured parlors in London were but places for the most immoral practices, his teachings crumbled into nothingness, and it was not long until the world knew him no more, the yellow sunflower lost its glory to his apers, and his reign was at end, with him a prison inmate for many years. Portland has this week been shamed before the entire world by the discovery that there is such an organization in her midst, and the authorities are now endeavoring to trace out all its devotess and give them the penalties that they deserve. You would naturally suppose that men indulging in such practices would hail from the lower and more debased walks of life, but such seems not the case, those having already confessed to the practices coming from the ranks of the most respected business men, and even contaminating an organization known the world over for the good it is doing in building up the minds and bodies of our younger men. There is only one way to effectually throttle such crimes, and that is to discover as far as possible all who indulge in them, and to give them such drastic sentences as to make others so afraid of the consequences that they will not venture. In Multnomah's newly elected sheriff we believe that the right man has been found for the place. He has openly avowed that he is an unrelenting enemy of road houses, and their resultant evils, and we expect that he will be just as persistent in ferreting out other evils and bringing the perpetrators to justice. The road house, which he swears shall flourish near Portland no more, is not the only place where vice and degeneracy may safely abide, but he may look for it in the rooming houses, the hotels, and also, we are sorry to say, in the homes themselves. Everyone cannot but help but dispise he who would lead a young girl astray, but he who tends to the moral downfall of a young lad is just as bad, in fact more debased in his own nature than the other. From these late developments and the work that Governor West has laid out for him, it begin to look as if Word will have his hands full when he assumes the shrevealty of our clean and immaculate metropolis, Another censure that cannot help but be made by all decent people is the way in which this recent development was treated by a Portland evening paper, it going into all the loathsome details as far as possible and keep within the law, spreading the knowledge of such debauchery among young and old all over the city, for no greater reason than to benefit its financial pocket. Papers that thus pander to the loathsome things of life should be forbidden sale on the streets of any of our cities, and entirely denied the use of the mails. The facts themselves are generally bad enough, without bringing them into the lime light in such words as to acquaint the young and innocent with all their hideousness.

Wilson has announced an extra session of congress to convene next April and set about the reforms that it was pledged in his election by the American people would take place. Taft made the same promise to the American people, and he was elected because many believed that any tinkering with the tariff should come from said tariff's greatest friends, and not from the party that has for so many years seen its frailities and desired to rectify them. Taft was easy in the matter and dilly dallied along, until the people became disgusted, and the result was the formation of a third party and the defeat of both at the polls by the party to whom all looked to really remedy the evil. As far as Wilson can, he has immediately made good, and now it remains with congress to see if the good work may go on. Everything seems to be in favor of such a change, and that a tariff revision will occur that will relieve the burdens the people are so rightfully complaining of, and yet not so seriously disturb the business of the country as to cause a depression in market values. The tariff is, we must acknowledge, one of the most tickless questions with which we have to deal, yet it seems certain that there must be a happy medium somewhere to be found that will aid the consumer and yet not take away the necessary profit from the producer. But we believe we have the best men in the country on the job, and if they cannot make a success of it, it is certain that no one else can. Let us all wish them success in the venture.

Much newspaper talk is now being indulged in as to whether Bryan will accept a place in the cabinet, which all concede will be tendered him, and columns of space are being used up daily in arguments pro and con on the matter. While the Itemizer sincerely believes that Bryan would make a most welcome addition to the president's cabinet, by reason of his many years of experience, now fully ripened, and because of the great hold that he has obtained on the hearts of the entire people, be they democrats, republicans or third partyites, yet we hardly look for him to accept such a position. We believe that Mr. Bryan would prefer the position of a free lance, and not be hampered in his expressions by a cabinet position, which would undoubtedly hedge him in to no inconsiderable extent. As an adviser to the president, unhampered by cabinet restrictions, he would undoubtedly prove a most valuable ally. Both gentlemen are in thorough accord so far on the large questions of the day, but should a difference of opinion arise between them, it were better, in our opinion, that Mr. Bryan were only a private citizen,

U. S. Grant, of Dallas, was in Den ver a few weeks ago on an election day, and got his first glimpse of women voting. He was not greatly impressed in its favor. The women got rather excited over the wet and dry problem, which was the main issue of the day, and took the polls by storm and held them until the voting hours were passed, the result being that when some six thousand working men, who had waited until through work to cast their ballots, got there, they could not get to vote and lost their votes entirely. The women, incongruous as it may seem to some, were determined that the town should go wet, and were going to take no chances with late voters, the naturally chivalry of man of course helping them out, as none were so ungentlemanly as to rudely push themselves through a mob of women to the polls, no matter how badly they desired to exercise the right of a male citizen. Well, the women sent Denver wet by a big majority, but what would you do if a mob of them gathered before your polling place in Polk county, and stubbornly refused to give place. We rather imagine you would do like the Denverites: Go away back and sit down. What else would there be to do.
