STORAGE FOR ROOTS.

Opinions Expressed on This Important Subject by Country Gentlems In making provision for keeping rocts through winter, whether in pits or in out door heaps, or in basements or cellars of outhouses, or in buildings specially built for the purpose, there are certain requisites which are indispensable. The air should be kept pure to prevent decay, as well as other disadvantages, and therefore a continued ventilation must be kept up; but this ventilation must be very light or it will let in freezing air and the roots will be frozen. These requisites can be well understood some experience. The thickness of the walls and the amount of pro-tection from frost must be well observed. Pits or heaps out doors are often made too warm, and the roots are started to grow or rotting is induced. Heaps that are covered with straw and then with a coat of earth are kept best with plenty of straw to absorb any foul air and pro-tect the roots, while the quantity of earth in cover may be limited. A farmer who raised large quantities of roots was always very successful with his large heaps of potatoes by using a compact foot of straw to cover them and sorthed to only three inches of earth to hold it and if so down. Ventilating holes at the top were in part rendered needless on actransfer the great mass of straw with its absorbing power.
