The Corbett and Jackson fight took place at Douglas "Business College" and ended in the great battle of Horseshoe Bend, Feb. 6th, 1894, and was witnessed by almost the entire population of that beautiful little city, and surrounding country. The "war-like tribes" from the South and West assisted with a terrible "force of arms." As near as the writer can learn, the "black man" "got knocked out" the fourth round and animal nature of the most barbarous kind was aroused by parties concerned on both sides; and consequently a great battle took place. However, with the fery of a madman, Corbett sprang upon the "black man" and bore him to the ground and pounded his assailant's "intellectual" and "reasoning powers" most unmercifully.
