How Jeremiah Judkins

(By James Judson Martelle.) HE Muse of Story leads me not to New England's rugged hills, to the sugar plantations of Louisiana or to the level plains of Kansas. Muses are peculiar and unexplainable beings and are apt to do anything. This fact in a measure atones for the introduction of a narrative which shall have for its scene of incidents a place not far distant from the homes of those who will perchance, go with me in the recital of many stirring happenings of Western life.

On a small farm, in the midst of prosperous surroundings, about twenty niles from Heppner, lives Jeremiah Judkins. The farm consists of one hundred and sixty acres of the best soil to be found in Morrow county, and Jeremiah being of an industrious and Armenians are preparing for refrugal inclination, has it well fenced and bellion.

But when a man has taken the oath to execute the laws of his country and then sets up his own will above the law, and the people ignore his offense, and support those who applaud him, (for instance, the Chicago Tribune, St. Louis Globe-Democrat and the Oregonian are calling upon republicans to sustain Grover in his bond racket), that country is near her "Scylla and Charybdis," and they are anarchy or monarchy.
