LITTLE FRENCH MARY.

BY SARAH ORNE JEWETT.

The town of Dulham was not used to seeing foreigners of any sort, or to hearing their voices in its streets, so that it was in some sense a matter of public interest when a Canadian family was reported to have come to the white houses by the bridge. This house, small and low-storied, with a bushy little garden in front, had been standing empty several months. Usually when a house was left tenanted in Dulham it remained so and fell into decay, and, after some years, the cinna-mon roof, bushes straggled into the cellar and the dutiful grass grew over the mound that covered the chimney bricks. Dulham was a quiet place, where the population dwindled steadily, though such citizens as remained had more and more reason to think it as pleasant as any country town in the West.

Some of the old men who met every day to talk over the town affairs were much interested in the newcomers. They approved the course of the strong-looking young Canadian laborer, who had been quick to seize upon his opportunity; one or two of them had already engaged him to make their gardens and to do odd jobs, and were pleased with his quickness and willingness. He had come afoot one day from a neighboring town, where he and his wife had been made ill by bad drainage and factory work, and saw the little house, and asked the postmaster where there was any work to be had out of doors the spring in Dulham. Being assured of his prospects, he reappeared with his pale, bright-eyed wife and little daughter the very next day but one. This startling promptness had given time for but few persons to hear the news of a new neighbor, and as one after another came over the bridge and along the road there were many questions asked. The house seemed to have new life looking out of its small-paned windows; there were clean white curtains, and china dogs on the window sills, and a blue smoke in the chimney—the spring sun was shining in at the wide-open door.

There was a chilly east wind on an April day, and the elderly men were gathered inside the post office, which was also the chief grocery and dry goods store. Each was in his favorite armchair, and there was the excuse of a morning fire in the box stove to make them form again into the close group that was usually broken up at the approach of summer weather. Old Capt. Weathers was talking about Alexis, the newcomer (they did not try to pronounce his last name), and was saying for the third or fourth time that he never worked you set for the Frenchman the better pleased he seemed to be. "Helped me to lay a carpet yesterday at our house, most as wax," said the captain, with approval. "Made the garden in the front yard so it hasn't looked so well for years. We're all going to find him very handy; he'll have plenty to do among us all summer. Sooner to know what you want the minute you point, for he can't make out very well in his English. I used to be a talker, but since the French in my early days when I sailed from southern ports to Havre and Bordeaux, but I don't seem to recall it any more well. He'd have made a smart snilor. Alexis would, quick an' willing."

"They say Canada French ain't spoke the same way," began the captain's devoted friend, Mr. Ezra Spooner, by way of assurance, when the French man opened and a bright light shone looking in. All the gray-headed men turned that way, and every one of them smiled.

"Come right in, dear," said the kind-hearted old captain.

They saw a charming little creature about six years old, who smiled back again from under her bangs, and wore a pink dress that made her look still more like a flower, and she said "Bon jour" prettily to the gentlemen as she passed. Henry Staples, the storekeeper and postmaster, rose behind the counter to serve his customer as if she had been a queen, and took from her hand the letter she brought, with the amount of its postage folded up in a warm bit of newspaper.

"The captain and his friends looked on with admiration.

"Give her a piece of candy—no, give it me an' I'll give it to her," said the captain, eagerly, reaching for his cane and leaving his chair with more than usual agility; and everybody looked on while he took a striped stick of peppermint from the storekeeper and offered it gallantly. There was something in the way this favor was accepted that savored of the French court and made every man in the store a lover.

"The child not only made a quaint bow before she reached out her hand with childish eagerness for the unexpected delight, but she topped forward and kissed the captain.

There was a murmur of delight at this charming courtesy; not a man there would not have liked to find some excuse for walking away with her, and there was a general sigh as she shut the door behind her and looked back through the glass with a proud smile.

"That's little French Mary, Alexis' little girl," said the storekeeper, eager to proclaim his advantage of previous acquaintance. "She came here yesterday and did an errand for her mother as nice as a grown person could."

"I never saw a little creature with prettier ways," said the captain, blushing and tapping his cane on the floor.

The first appearance of the little foreigner on an April day was like the coming of a young queen to her kingdom. She reigned all summer over every heart in Dulham—not a face but wore its smiles when French Mary came down the street, not a mother who did not say to her children that she would take care of each pretty manner and kept their frocks as nice as the children's, and sang like a fairy, and condescended to all childish games, and yet, best of all for her friends, seemed to see no difference between young and old. She sometimes followed Capt. Weathers home and discreetly dried or took tea with him and his housekeeper, an honored guest on rainy days, as might be found in the shoemaker's shop or the blacksmith's, watching them at their work; smiling much but speaking little, and teaching as much to French as she learned English. To this day, it is Dulham, people laugh and repeat her strange foreign words and phrases. Alexis, the father, was steady at his work of gardening and laying; Mary, the elder, his wife, washed and ironed and sewed and swept, and was a help in many households; now and then on Sunday they set off early in the morn-
