THE THRESHER GUESTS.

BY FLORENCE M'CALLEN.

It was almost nine o'clock on a breezy October morning when Miss Sophronia Ilse opened the neat little gate in front of Albert Stanning's new house. There was a broad walk leading up to a porch where a few great purple clematis blossoms upon a trellised vine showed that the deceitful October sun was coaxing out flowers which did not belong to his time.

Miss Sophronia heard the slow creak of a rocking-chair as she crossed the STING perch, and saw through the screen door a pretty young woman sitting with a book in her lap, reading. Her CONTAGIOUS in some confusion when she saw Miss Sophronia, tossed her book aside and pushed toward her guest another rocker.

While the visitor removed her prim old maid's bonnet and her cape, she noted the untidiness of the room, where the breakfast dishes were piled in a unsightly heap on the table, and flies held high carnival.

"I came up to help you, Cissy," she said. "I noticed as I passed Gorham's that the men were pitching from the last stack. They will be here before noon. Have you got your dinner under way?" The young woman colored and her eyes, which were not blue, but a yellowish gray, grew dull. They are not coming here or at least they are going to board at Father Stanning's." "Then it is true."

"What, pray?" The old maid rocked tranquilly and produced her knitting. "O. I heard some of the girls at the Society saying that you would not dare attempt to get dinner for the threshers; that your finnicky town ways might fool Albert, but you were too smart to try them on with the threshers. You know I do not pry into your affairs from a motive of idle curiosity, Cissy, and I want you to tell me why you are acting in this way."

"Well, Albert thinks I can't cook." This was said with an elaborate affectation of carelessness, but it did not deceive Miss Sophronia. "And yet I have often heard him boast of your good housekeeping-your cooking especially."

"O, yes—at first. But now we are all wrong. I hate that sort of men that go about with the steam thresher! I shudder to think of Jim Finn, for instance, coming into my house. I know that they will spit over everything and eat like wild beasts. And when I said so Albert got mad and said he would take them to his mother's, where they would get something fit to eat." "Quite naturally," murmured Ilse.

"Aunt Sophy! You were mother's friend and I owe a lot to you, but I am not going to bear that! 'Quite naturally' indeed! I think he was horrid." "Cissy, did you know Albert was a farmer when you married him?" "You know I did."

starshine, dewy apple blossoms, etc."

'And these men who do not know how to feed themselves according to your notion, are the very men, if I am not mistaken, who hauled and cut every stick of wood you burned that of you, Cecelia Stanning!"

> iently use, passed into the dining room where a long table was laid, as exquisite in every appointment as if the president of our great republic had been an expected guest. His wife was flitting about adding some finishing touches to the table, and Miss Sophronia was seated near a window with her knitting work in her hand, and a book upon her knee, knitting and reading as was her habit. Albert clutched his wife as she passed hlm. "So you didn't get mad at what I said this morning? I've felt like hanging myself to a sour-apple tree ever since."

"Yes, I was. Mad all through. And don't you ever say such things to me again. You and I to quarrel-after

Then she gave him a kiss, basted the browning fowls, turned the sputtering ham and thanked God she was alive, and that Albert was alive to love her. At twelve, before the last stroke had died away, the new dinner bell hung upon the top of a white oak pole by the well sounded forth its welcome summons; for to be "behind hand with dinner" in the Pretty Bob neighborhood was all as bad as to provide but one kind of pie.

Somehow as the men trooped in they did not seem quite so repulsive as a like crowd had been at harvest time. They were boisterous, bandying coarse jokes, making fun, Cissy knew, of what they were pleased to call her "pernickerty ways, and her "moonshine meals," but she merely smiled. She even hung up the fifth clean towel without a sign of disgust, and by the time they were seated at the table she owned to herself that even Jim Finn might be worse, for had she not seen him fondle her pet kitten, while waiting his turn at the washbowl?

She poured the fourth cup of coffee for poor, trembling, or nary neighbor Jones-who ate his pie with his knife, held within two inches of the point, and drew his great, hairy hand across his face in lieu of a pocket handkerchief-without once looking across at Albert. She asked Tim Lewis, who was more than suspected of making midnight visits to his neighbors' henroosts, how his lame boy was, and told "Then I suppose what I have heard him not to forget to take a pocketful is true; that you have no practical of sweet apples home to him. Midway in the meal Miss Sophronia looked up from her book. "I'd offer to help you, Cissy, but you seem to be getting along better withwinter your father died. I am ashamed out me. 'Too many cooks,' you know, 'spoil the broth.""

It would have done poor, tired Cissy good to hear the remarks of the men as "You have been used to them all they smoked their pipes under the oaks "That settles it," said one; "if I hear

By signs he made the white man understand that he had wounded the deer and the dog pulled it down. Then he cut up the doer, tied the forehalf of it up in the skin and placed it on one side. The other half he laid at Maj. Champion's feet, delivering himself of a speech in the Ute language. The white man understood his meaning, but not a word of his address. The Indian and the some one moving about in the dining the dog's owner was entitled to half dog had killed the deer together, and the game. The major was equal to the emergency. He rose and delivered in full the classical declamation: "My name is Norval," with appropriate gestures, just as he had many times given it at school. Nothing could have been better. The Indian and the white man shook hands with effusion, and each with his share of the venison rode
