A BANKRUPT TRIBE.

Their Unbroken Run of Ill Luck at a Game of Chance.

How the Black River Indians were Cleaned Out by the Puyallups lu the Great Twenty-Six Day "Sing Gamble" Near Tacoma.

Capt. Jack had to walk from the Puyallup reservation way over to the Black River reservation, says the Tacoma correspondent of the San Francisco Exam; iner. He had nothing with him except his clothes and his temper, both of which were very much worn, from the results of the recent protracted "sing gamble." The "sing gamble" is the great contest between two tribes of the Puget Sound Indians for the trophies of the year and for such blankets, wearing apparel, vehicles and horses as can be spared to be used for stakes, and sometimes more than should be spared. This year the "pot" at the beginning of the gamble onsisted of twelve Winchester rifles of the latest pattern, eleven sound horses, seven buggies, one hundred blankets, forty-three shawls, an uncounted pile of mats, clothing for men and women some badly worn and some in good condition, but mostly worn, and forty-nine dollars in money.

This year the "sing gamble" was held in the barn of Jake Tai-ugh, commonly known as Charley Jacobs, whose place is four miles from Tacoma. At the beginning of the "sing gamble" sixty-seven old men and women, many of them wrinkled, many of them grayheaded, gathered at Jake's big barn, which had been cleared of all hay, grain and other stores. On the ground, which serves as a floor, were laid two mats woven from straw and weeds and flags. Each of these mats was three feet wide and six feet long. Between the mats was the space of about three feet. Around these squatted the serious gamblers of the ancient races, many of them wearing brilliant colored blankets, others arrayed in combination costumes picked up at the reservation or in the town.

As a necessary preparation to the game, the drummers, one for each tribe, took positions in front of their drums, made of horse hide drawn over one end of a stout frame two feet and six inches deep. Beating heavily on these drums with sticks, the sound is similar to that from a bass drum, save that it is more sonorous and is readily heard a distance of half a mile. As the drums beat the Indians begin their chants or wails, the men shouting: "Hi-ah, hi-ah, hi-ah, and the women moaning an accompaninent between the shouts of their oraves, sounding something like this:

Mm-uh, mm-uh, mm-uh." The players gather around the mats, seven being permitted on each side. One mat is for the Puyallups, the other for the Black Rivers.
