Mr. and Mrs. Messinger were simple, unaffected people devoted to their children and to Nancy, Mr. Messinger's roung stepsister.

One sunny afternoon in early summer Mrs. Messinger sat at the open bay window of the drawing-room reading. The door opened presently and Nancy came in rather slowly. She came over to the window and seated herself in a low basket chair with an air of constraint.

"I have a letter from Jim," she said. "Does he say when he is coming?" "Yes; he came by the same steamship as the letter. He will be here tomorrow, I suppose. "Nancy! really?" asked Mary, looking almost excited. "Are you not de-

"I-I-have a confession to make," said Nancy, nervously, looking out over the sea. "I thought I loved Jim when he went out to India five years go, but I was only seventeen then, and did not realize what love meant. We had known each other all our lives, and I mistook our friendship for love.

"I have felt it dimly for a year or two, but what made it all clear to me | India?" she said, unresponsively. was Jim's last letter, saying that he dismay and fear. I felt that I simply could not meet him as his betrothed wife, so I wrote last mail and asked him to release me from my engage-

"And what does he say?" Mary asked, "He is delighted," said Nancy, orightening. "He says that his feel-ngs have changed too." "You never hinted at any change before," said Mary, a little reproach-

"I only knew it dimly or I might have done so," replied Nancy, gently. 'And since I wrote to him I have been ilent to spare you may maxiety. My etters have never been from the present Nancy, but from the Nancy as I could remember her at seventeen. In fact, I have been writing down all the time to the level of his intelligence as shown in his letters, and that level is painfull | low."

"He would be much more likely to object if he once saw you," said Mary, frankly, "for these five years have done wonders with you in every way." "Oh, he's so boyish that he will think his vehemence. asked Mary in surprise. "Well," confessed Nancy, rather reluctantly, "I believe I had some secret, unconfessed hope that he would offer to break off the engagement if he once saw that hideous caricature."

A day or two later Nancy started for her usual afternoon walk along the cliffs. Walking quickly along, she did not hear footsteps behind her, and was surprised at hearing herself suddenly For cates, tickets, sleeping our reservations, addressed. "You are Nancy, are you not?" he said, doubtfully, holding out his hand. "Why, Jim, is it really you?" asked Nancy, regarding him with surprise. "How you have grown! When did you | For five years I have thought of you come? and how did you find me?" "I came two days ago," he said, reddening slightly in irritation at her first that you are mine no longer. Say, that words, "but I called at the Ness this you forgive me, Nancy, for my roughafternoon and Mrs. Messinger told me where I should find you."

"Let us go home now, and then you can see them all," she said, turning back. "You will hardly know the children; they were such mites when

"I certainly shall not, if they have altered as much as you have done. I searcely knew you," he said, looking down at her with intent gray eyes, and inwardly comparing this beautiful, graceful girl with the gauche schoolgirl of five years since.

"I am older," she said, her heart sinking strangely. "He might disguise the fact that he finds me a disappointing failure," she thought, rather bittof course we are no longer boy and girl," he said. "But I hope we shall always be friends. Nancy! We have been that all our lives, haven't we?" "Yes, let us be friends," she said. And, thinking that he was eager to impress upon her that they were to be nothing more, she added: "And it was very wise to break off that childish engagement before you came home,

"Y-yes," he said, doubtfully. Those boy and girl engagements never answer, do they? People develop so differently from what one would expect. Judging from your letters, 1 abould have thought you utterly different from what I find you."

"You are equally different from what I should have expected you to be," she answered. "But let us put up with such other as we are; we need not see much of one another, you know." They had just reached the gate leadhe into the garden of the Ness as she said this, and unconsciously she paused

Jim took this, coupled with her last words, as a bint that he should go, and was more burn than he cared to own. "Good afternoon," he said, stiffly, raising his hat. "Your suggestion is a brilliant one, and you need not fear that I shall trouble you with my prescuce more often than is necessary." "thool-by," she said, turning in at the open gate in order that he should not see the rising tears. "Good-by," he said, freezingly, thinking her absolutely cruel in not shaking knitting his brows. "He is our curate," she answered. "I always say that this is the finest view in town, but Mr. Penstone maintains that the view from-" "He must be an idiot, then," burst in you any other interesting accusations to make? "Forgive me, Nancy, I was a fool!" pleaded Jim, earnestly. "I forget sometimes that I have not still the right to speak to you on such matters. as my promised wife, and now that 1 am with you I cannot always realize ness and presumption." After this quarrel Jim found it impossible to be on the same footing of friendship with Nancy. She was colder and more constrained than ever in her manner toward him, and he was too proud and too manly to force his love on her, believing that she disliked him; and at last, after a bitter struggle with himself, he determined to return to India at once. He had never been to the Ness lately without some valid reason, and this new necision was so good an excuse for calling that he was not slow in taking idvantage of it. He found Nancy in the garden, arrayed in a large white sun bonnet, busy gathering straw-
