dog, and Mr. Nims must always have a great clumsy hulk, good for nothing but to bark and eat and lie around under foot, while Mis' Nims, she marn't have even a kitten, though she set everything by a cat. And so it went. One day I stepped in to borrow Mis' Nims' cutting-board, and just as I got to the door I heard her say: "You ain't St. Paul Kansas City going to turn Charley in amongst my flowers, be ye?" He didn't condescend any reply-not as I could hear.

"Now, Mr. Nims," says she, "he's stepped on my pansy-bed and broke off a dahlia a'ready. Ain't there any other place on this whole farm where you can put him? I don't want him here," says she.

Mr. Nims' countenance didn't change more than a wooden Indian. "I do," says he. "There's a good bating of grass to be fed down, and I calculate to leave Charley here for a spell," though he'd swallowed a a ramrod. Mis' Nims didn't say a word more but she gave that old dog a push that sent him out of doors with a yelp; and I didn't blame her a mite, nuther.

I brought the cutting-board back as one identical word did he speak, only thing. An' no more wouldn't he. to ask if I'd have another potato.

"Why, Mr. Nims?" I heard her kind o' gasp out, and I surmised by the sound that she let fall a teacup. I I looked to hear her burst out in her quick way, and I'll warrant ye he supposed she'd flare up, and that would be the end on't. But she seemed dumfounded. By 'n' by she said, quite quiet: have me there. He misses Sarah Jane, and so do the children. There has to be somebody at the head to make things so. But what would you do,

"The bed and table stuff is hers," said he.

"Oh, no, Elisha!" says she, "I don't consent to that. Sarah Jane had a good setting-out, and Asa's house is full. Besides, if I find I need more things I can make 'em, and your mother's eyesight plagues her. She can't do as she could once," she says.

"The bed and table furnishings are hers," Mr. Nims repeated. "What she didn't make she bought with her butter money.

"No, 'Lisha," Mis' Nims began; but Squire Hosley interrupted her. I see says he. And he budged off as stiff as they was beginning to wear on his patience. "Why not put the property in two piles and draw cuts, if you've no choice. That would be fair," says he. I knew by the way I heard her snuff that Mis' Nims hadn't give up, though they was a-settin' down to dinner, and she said no more-not then; but from Mis' Nims asked me to draw up to the that they went on to wrangle over table.
