A BARBER'S MISTAKE.

The barber was talkative, like others of his kind, but the patron strangely reserved.

"Hair cut?" asked the barber. The patron merely nodded.

The barber made one or two ineffectual attempts to start a conversation and then settled down to his work in silence. For nearly five minutes nothing was heard, but the clicking of the shears, but the effort to be quiet was too great. "Funny about these Sunday ballgames," he anggested at last.

The patron said "yes" in an inquiring, careless sort of a way.

The patron didn't seem to be interested, so the barber tried a new tack. "Corbett's doing an awful lot of talking, it seems to me," he said. The patron nodded.

EARLIEST OF ROSES.

The Provence or Cabbage Hose Described by Herodotus. In a learned article on roses the Quarterly Review says: "The earliest certain trace in Greek literature of the rose as a cultivated flower is to be found in Herodotus, in his account of the rise of the house of Macedonia. The sons of Temenus, he says (book viii., 138), fled into another part of Macedonia, and took up their abode 'near the gardens of Midas. In these Mr. gardens are roses which grow of themacives'-that is, we suppose, without much attention to pruning or budding 'so sweet that no others can vie with them in this, and their blossoms have as many as sixty petals apiece."

Every rosegrower will at once recognize in this the most venerable of all rose records, the original rosa centifolia, still more than two thousand years afterward one of the sweetest in many an old English garden-the old Provence or cabbage ruse.
