Minnesota and the Dakotas Children Must Keep Off the Streets at Night -Revival of an Inquisitorial Custom.

In our western states there is so much faith in the mysterious power of legislation that not merely commercial advantage and political honesty are ordered by law, but even private morality is often made the subject of legislation. This is done, says the New York Sun, as hopefully as if all the laws of the past had done what was expected of them. The latest of these experiments is the Minnesota process for making children good. It is a revival of the curfew custom, which does not seem original until one considers that its application to life on the edge of the twentieth century is in reality making a new thing of it. This revival affects all persons under sixteen years of age, and is the device of a Minnesota editor, who hit upon the discovery that children of evil inclination will change their natures if they can be kept off the streets. The plan was first put in operation in Stillwater last winter, and has swept like a fire over the state until today nearly twenty cities have passed ordinances reviving the old cover-fire law which was borrowed from or else gave rise to the military institution of the reveille. Only the largest towns, like St. Paul. Minneapolis and Duluth, have held back and given reason for the belief that parents are still entitled to the exercise of their judgment in the ordering of their home government.

Without considering the prerogative of parents the mass of the common councilmen, preachers and editors of the state declare the system an excellent one, as it-undoubtedly is if the rights of the parents and of the individual generally are not worth consideration. The new practice has spread into South Dakota, where four or five towns have already adopted it, and it is prophesied that by next January all the towns in both Dakotas (the same that were carried for prohibition by the strength of the Swedish vote will put it into effect. Then, as one enthusiastic Minnesota editor predicts, "the curfew bell will ring in an order of things that shall, in the not far distant future, raise the standard of manhood and womanhood both morally and physically and make better citizens of Without considering the prerogative physically and make better citizens of the rising generation."

In some of the towns and cities the church bells are rung at the curfew hour, and in all of them the town bell, either in the fire tower or the town hall, rings out the command for the police to clear the streets of children. companiment of protest. It is an old saying that every dog has his day. According to an English authority, that day is neither very long or specially comfortable in Fiji. It is impossible to keep foreign dogs alive for much more than a couple of years. Those born there may live four years. The cause of this mortality is a species of worm that lives in the blood vessels. arteries and heart. Adult specimens of this parasite sometimes measure as much as five inches, and the blood of some animals is actually swarming with them. Puppies are often troubled with them, although it seems to take about six months to develop them to a troublesome stage. When a dog is at tacked, it begins with a sharp barking. which is at once recognized as the be ginning of poor Fido's last chapter. Thus far no remedy has been found or even suggested. The same parasite is found in dogs in eastern Asia, and identical symptoms are noted. The animal may live six months to two
