DANGEROUS GAME.

The Vindictive Peccary and Some of Its Queer Traits.

The Hunters Who Know Anything About
This Strange Animal Select the Point of Vantage.

"I haven't the least idea in the world that you ever hunted a peccary, did you?" asked a sportsman who affects a knowledge of and delight in large and ont-of-the-common kinds of game, says the New York Sun. "Of course you CURES CANCER, never did, and unless you have a carttoad of nerve and ammunition enough to stock a garrison I wouldn't advise you to. The peccary, as you doubtless know, is a little animal somewhat on the wild hog order, and he roams pretty much where he pleases in southern Texas and abutting regions. There was a time when it was thought that nothing would kill a peccary but arrows in-NORTHERN Ry. . PACIFIC RY. coulated with the deadly poison of the bloated rattlesnake of the Staked Plains, which the Apache Indians have a cheerful way of distilling and applying, but that was before the days of Winchester rifles. A bullet from a Winchester is just searching enough to find a peccary's vitals, but the range doesn't want to be too long. "When a man goes out hunting pec-game and bring it down with his trusty rifle. Not when he hunts peccaries, he doesn't. If he did, nineteen seconds after he fired his first shot he would be apportioned out among the drove in twoounce lots, buttons, boots and baggage counted in. The daring peccary hunter shins up a tall tree near where the cheerful creatures will more than likely come to feed. The peccary has one great virtue. He can't climb a tree. Perched safely on a limb the bold huntaman waits for the coming of the peccaries, and when the drove comes trotting and grunting along beneath him he sends a bullet through a peccary's heart. The wounded peccary lies down at once. He knows just what's the matter. He turns his glittering bead of an eye up toward the hunter and dies without uttering a sound. "One peccary killed out of a drove, the hunter must either have ammunition enough to kill all the rest or provisions enough to last him a year, for the survivors at once take positions on their haunches waiting for the hunter to come down. If hate, in the fullest sense of the word, can be expressed by looks, then the peccary can look and act it toward any living thing that has done it or its companion an injury. The peccaries were the original knights of labor, for their motto has been from the beginning: 'An injury to one is the concern of all.' They never let up when they start out to avenge an injury. The hunter may shoot one after another of the waiting and watching drove, and each one, as it receives its death wound, lies down without a murmur and dies, never removing its glar ing eyes from its slaver as long as life lasts. The living peccaries pay no attention to the deal or dying, but sit there on their haunches, hoping for revenge until the last one dies. As a drove of peccaries will in ten seconds tear a grizzly bear into such minute fragments that you can scarcely find a piece of bone two inches long after the cere mony is over, you can imagine what show a hunter would have in meeting a hostile group of them. But unmolested a drove of pescaries is as harmless as a drove of sharp, except toward bears or mountain lions. You may pass within ten feet of a drove of these vin lietive little animals, and they will not notice you with any hostile intent unless you are foolish enough for all ordinary emergencies. There are, however, special occasions on which a call is made for unusual sagacity, and it is then that we see how near these creatures come to reasoning in the same way as our foolish enough four all their lives what were could have become of gotten up in the most elegant manner, including four large size Portraits.

CARMENCITA, the Spanish Dancer, PADEREWSKI, the Great Planist, draws the line at bears and mountain lions. If you are looking for either of the lutter and find peccaries, change your base. You will find neither grizdrove of sheep, except toward bears or THE NEW YORK MUSICAL ECHO CO.

Physically, as well as morally, he seems to be an abnormal sort of creature. He has the general appearance and habit of the hog, but the hoofs and three A smachs of the cow. On his back he has a gland which secretes a much and three minutes after a peccary overhead, and near enough to drop to the musk, and these minutes after a peccary is killed the flesh will be entirely improgram of with the secretion. THE FLOWERING BROOM. A Rare and Beautiful Plant Growing in Madeira.

The plant known under this name, Genista virgata, at Kew, is one of the largest and finest members of the entire genus, says the London Field, and should be made a note of by anyone anxious to select the best of our hardy flowering shrubs. It forms a freelybranched bush of rounded outline that reaches a height of ten feet or more, and about the end of June it is so thickpresent quite a mass of that hue, which, secially at that season, is particularly attractive, for though the bulk of our hardy leguminose produce yellow blossoms, most of them are over before this species commences to unfold its flow-

Though it has been such a conspicuous feature during each recurring season at Kew for many years, it appears to be but little known, and may be sought for in vain in the catalogues of many of our nurserymen, at least under the specific name of virgata. There is certainly a good deal of confusion with regard to its correct nomenciature, for Kew plant is certainly neither of these; indeed, it was there for a long time grown under the name of G. clata. but within the last few years this has been superseded by the name it now been which he knew to be some kind of hawk, but whose manner of flight puzzied him extremely. It was beating up the wind to ward him as if with a sorely wounded wing, manifestly impeded in some way that caused it to niguag and struggle strangely in its flight.

A HAWK'S REASONING.

How He Carried His Prey Against th Wind with Comparative Ease.

Seeing that if it kept its course it was likely to pass within easy shot, the keeper quietly retired into a clump of ferns on one knee, with his gun ready for action. He had, however, to wait longer than he had expected, for the hawk meanwhile alighted on the top of a large gray bowlder a hundred yards away, and seemed very busy about something, though what it was the keeper at that distance could not make out. In about five minutes, however, the bawk keeper's gun. On going up to his prize the keeper found that it was indeed a hawk, and beside it was lying a plump partridge, well grown, but to the keeper's surprise almost altogether stripped of its feathers. On going to the bowlder on which the kestrel had rested for awhile, all the missone thing is certain, the peccary is ing feathers of the partridge were found tough and absolutely without fear."

scattered about, and the keeper instantly took in the state of matters from first to last and explained it thus:

The kestrei, having struck down the partridge, was carrying the dainty morsel to his greedy fledglings in their nest. The wind, however, was strong and gusty and adverse to the kestrel's line of flight; and of the wird, the wings and tail, limp and pendant, of the partridge caught so much that it was only with great difficulty the plucky little capter could make any satisfactory head-

Getting tired of the struggle at last he must have reasoned with himself some what after this fashion: "My martindre burgen is more difficult to ly laden with its golden blossoms as to got along with than it really need be. I ar
