Charming Squares.

Fome of the London squares are queint and charming, being mostly laid out in the Dutch fashion. Golden square, near Regent street; Red Lion and Queen squares, in Bloomsbury, are capital specimens. The first, though so close to Regent street, might be a dozen miles away; there is a welcome unkempiness; the grass is rank and wild; there are old trees ranged around its border in a systematic way. The houses round are picturesque, ecause every one is distinct. The square is given over to commission agents, merchants and trade generally, yet within a few years it was a place of genteel residence, like a usual square, and we find the late Cardinal Wiseman living in a substantial manaion here. Dickens, it will be remembered, placed Ralph Nickelby's house here, which is described on the occasion of the party of Sir Frederick and Sir Mulberry as having almost palatial spartments and the richest furniture. As we wander around we are struck with the melancholy tone of the inclosure, yet every thing seems brisk enough, but it be-

The grass and walks are laid out with a certain free-and-easy carelessness that is very acceptable and contrasts with the trim, shaven, soulless treatment of modern squares. Altogether a visit to Golden square will interest.

the Real Vernacular. In a four-roomed house in a short thoroughfare in the most populous part of the west side live "Jamesy" and his family. His family consists of a father and mother, and a younger brother and a younger sister. Although "Jamesy," as the eldest child, is perhaps the most important member of the family, he is less than seven years old, and not very large for his age. The greater portion of his brief life has been spent on the sidewalk, where he learned to fight his own battles and take a few hard knocks without grieving. His father and mother are hard-working people, but they have been so busy for two or three years getting soup bones and firewood to throw at the wolf that "Jamesy's" education has been neglected. The boy learned many things, but he didn't get them out of a primer. For two months he had been "hustlin' papers, until a truant inspector found m one day and took him home. "Jamesy's" mother was told that the boy belonged in school, and that he must be started in at once. She was a well-meaning woman and agreed that "Jamesy's" education should begin the next morning. The boy went to the schoolhouse half fetermined to "duck" at recess, but the teacher treated him so kindly and there was so much of a povelty in the show that he decided to remain. He soon began to feel at home, and he scraped up a whispering acquaintance with a small Jew boy at his right. The teacher interested him greatly. He watched her draw a picture of a cube, and then heard her read off a row of figures from the blackboard, and he concluded that she was the smartest person in the world, except the man at the one cent show who made a beautiful colored landscape while the orchestra played

This aroused Jimmie. If there was anything he delighted in it was repeating, with sundry emphatic gestures, to younger brother at home accounts of the daring exploits of Tom Dalton and Jesse Junea as he heard them from the lips of older boys. He was certainly interested, and if school was like this he made up his mind to put up; with several disagreeable features and return the next forenoon. He straightened himself in his seat at the request to "sit erect," prepared to absorb every word of the expected story.

The teacher said: "Now, I will read this from this little book, and any of you who wish to can repeat it to the class in your own words. Don't try to say it as I read it, but just as you would say it." Jimmie's eyes grew big, and he was all attention. The teacher read this short lesson from the first

"Criminy!" thought Jimmie, "is 'at all? 'At's dead easy." His hand was up in a twinkling, in imitation of several others. His interested face caught the teacher's eye, and she said: "Well, James, you may try it, but be careful to get it right. You may stand up by your sent."

"Jamsey" arose. Ordinarily he was not bashful, but now his face was flushed, and he was trembling with importance, as he said: "Get onto de cow. Ain't she a beaut?
