AN IMPROVED WHITE HOUSE. The Presidential Family to Have Greater

Conveniences. The residence of the president of the United States ought to be worthy of the office. The present white house is equal to all the requirements of such a residence, so far as it goes. It is a simple and dignified building, whose beauty is a constant delight to appreciative persons. It was conceived and carried out by the architect who planned it in the proper spirit, but it is not large enough for the uses to which it is necessarily put. The country and the city of Washington have grown, and the president's house have not grown with them. A large part of it is given up to the business offices of the president, his private secretary, and his clerks, and the president's family are deprived of the use of another large part of the lower floor of the house be cause it is necessarily on public view most of the time. The family is therefore cramped for proper accommodations, and there are no rooms for the entertainment of guests. Moreover, the house is so badly arranged as to entrances, exits, and hallways that a state reception there is always an uncomfortable and dangerous jam, while many an invited guest, and many officers who attend certain functions under orders, have been made seriously ill be cause they have been compelled to stand for hours in cold or stormy weath er until they could gain admittance through the single door that can be used for the purpose.

The deficiencies of the white house are so thoroughly recognized in Washington that for many years efforts have been making to secure worthier accommodations for the president. Some of these efforts have been in the wrong direction, because they have contemplated other buildings, foreign to the intent and character of the white house, within the same grounds. Other efforts still are attempts of speculators to move the site of the mansion to the hills north of the city.

The white house, with all its charms and memories, should be preserved, and it should remain on its present beau tiful and historic site, its fine ground unencumberd by other structures. In furtherance of this idea, a plan prepared by Mr. Arthur J. Dillon shows conclusively that the white house can be made, not only abundantly spacious, but even improved, while its architectural features will be at the same time preserved.—Harper's Weekly.

Preparation of the New Zealand Product for the Market. The reason why Argentine mutton generally is of inferior price to that of New Zealand has a three-fold explanation. In the first place New Zealand possesses to-day a mutton-producing breed superior to that known in the Plate. In the second, the New Zealander feeds his stock during the winter time with extra forage, while in the Argentine the sheep are allowed to graze ipon the same bare pampa during the dead season.
